To the Right Honourable,

PHILIP DORMER STANHOPE, EARL OF CHESTERFIELD,

Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, one of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy-Council, &c. &c.

MY LORD,

IT must be a peculiar happiness to every author, (and not the less so, for being unfrequent,) that choice and judgment should direct him to a Patron, as well as obligation and gratitude. It is moreover an addition to my good fortune, that these imperfect labours have been perused, protected, and encouraged by One, whose single approbation is a sort of universal passport throughout all Europe.

With

DEDICATION.

With what pleasure could I indulge myself in painting a character alike amiable, as well as illustrious? But, my LORD, the delicacy of your cast of mind deters me forcibly. It may suffice therefore to remark with brevity, that I have raised this little monument, as a testimony of my private esteem and affection; and if the duration of it proves short and transitory, it is not from want of zeal and spirit in the person who erecteth it: but from the inability of the artist, and the unsubstantiality of the materials he uses. I know my bounds;— and shall proceed no farther than to assure your LORDSHIP that I am, with the highest regard,

Your most Obliged,

and most Faithful Servant,

W. HARTE.

P R E F A C E.

MOST persons of moderate learning and abilities, after finishing what is commonly called the tour of travelling into foreign countries, have been induced, either from self-love, or the partial sollicitations of their friends, to make a present to the public of some performance, which took its rise from a closer and more intimate acquaintance with distant states and kingdoms than usually falls to the share of such people as make a part of an insular nation. As the person who did me the honour to accept of my poor and imperfect services, exhorted me rather to be profuse than sparing in such expences as tended to the acquisition of knowledge, whether in history, politics, antiquities, laws of government, manners of courts, &c. I had once thoughts of reducing the observations of my travels into form; but upon mature reflection, it appeared to me, that the relative situations of kingdoms and states were disquisitions merely of a periodical nature; and as to antiquities, buildings, paintings, and so forth, they had been described already, even to tediousness. The inaccuracies and errors of other travellers soon taught me to suspect my own; for many or most of them depend principally (not thro' indolence and inattention, but on the contrary from want of time and proper opportunity) upon the relations of natives, which are always partial and insincere; or on such extracts as they are enabled to compile from books in vogue among the respective people thro' whose countries they pass. For these reasons I threw my materials aside; and after such a frankness and generosity of confession, it is natural to conclude that I shall procure my pardon from the public on easy terms. Yet the dye was cast, that I should disturb the tranquillity of readers by some means or other, and enter their closets unsought-for with my literary present: That I do so is certain; but 'tis with respect and diffidence, and the little delineation I make them a tender of, carries this slight recommendation with it, that it is an original sketch, and not an imitation.

Now as part of the commission I was entrusted with induced me to renew my acquaintance with the modern history of other nations, I applied myself a second time to an undertaking that had been suggested to me in the earlier parts of life, by my first friend and protector the late EARL of PETERBOROW, and which I then declined, merely thro' deficiency of materials, and from want of that intercourse with learned historians of other nations, which it hath since been my good fortune to acquire and cultivate. For these reasons I have resumed the history of Gustavus Adolphus more properly than undertaken it; and so much the rather, inasmuch as co-incidentally with that period of narration, opportunities are given me of throwing new lights into the political transactions of my own country; and that in the course of a reign partially understood, but uncommonly important.

At first sight, without reflection, it may appear to some, that I have engaged myself in an undertaking which seems to be foreign from the studies of my own profession, and that the life of a warrior, interspersed with matters of civil history, bear no connection with the pen of an ecclesiastic: but the life of that warrior, which time and accident have reserved for me the honour of undertaking, happens by a rare and unparalleled felicity to be the life of an hero, who, not contented to perform the greatest actions in the field and cabinet, superadded to his glory (in order to make the figure of it truly circular and perfect) the grand accomplishing perfection of an honest, a moral, and a religious man; in all which last-mentioned lights he appears to me as great and amiable as in the two former. For these reasons, I had ever a strong inclination to make this illustrious and extraordinary personage better known to posterity; and if in the execution of such an undertaking I shall happen to acquit myself without commendation, mendation, the fault must lie at my own door ; for I writ with pleasure, upon an earnest desire of becoming useful.

Amongst other things, it has been my singular good fortune to provide and amass materials to such an abundance, that I found myself plung'd into an ocean of history, as full and redundant as that of the poet,

Omnia Pontus erant, decrant quoque littora Ponto ;

so that my principal difficulty lay in the grand secret of selection and rejection ; and what is equally extraordinary (but more to my disgrace if I succeed ill) I have from a strange fatality in mankind, but one competitor, properly speaking as a * biographer, whose work is only a short superficial compilement squeezed from the droppings of gazettes and courants in those days ; so that if historians could be arranged into gradual classes of perfection (in the manner Des Piles has made an intellectual barometer, whereby to estimate the merit of painters) I should make no scruple to place M. de Prade in the very lowest predicament of excellence ‡. Yet to give him his due, he aims at nothing, and is nothing.

* Histoire de Gustave Adolphe, dit Le Grand. A Par. 12°. 1695, pagg. 167.

‡ Professor Menke, whose collection in history was well known to all Europe, hath given us a picture of this book to the life: PEU DE CHOSES. Catalogue des Principaux Historiens, p. 413.

Pauper videri vult Cinna, & est pauper.

And under this head there appears to me an ulterior circumstance worthy to be recounted, namely, that the life of Gustavus could never have made its entrance into the world at a period more interesting than the present, for the counter-part of the tricennial war, after a revolution of one hundred years, is now rekindled in the self-same countries; The two protestant heroes bear a great resemblance each to the other; the motives are similar, and the provocation parallel.

Yet what induced me solely to write the life of Gustavus, was the character he will be found to bear as a man of honesty, magnanimity, morality, and religion: as to your merely belligerent heroes, I consign them to other hands. But after having long studied my inimitable example in the various situations of piety and honour, and indulged a close examination into all that hath been published partially or peevishly concerning him by the several writers of the two religions, I find no breach of trust, no habitual immorality, no infraction of religion, no negative inattention to public virtue or private devotion, which can strictly and with propriety be laid to his charge. I can discover but one habitual fault in the whole of his conduct (and that too may be alleviated, viated, as it seems to be a constitutional frailty, interwoven with the warmth of his nature) which is, that he was subject on certain occasions to a momentary transport of passion; which, far from concealing, I have touched upon, not unsparingly, in more places than one. But we never find him in the department of an encroaching or insolent king; we never discover him false or dishonourable in any one of the relative or social duties: he preferred no man, but for merit and probity; he broke his faith neither with potentate nor with subject; and as to military and state-favourites, they were a sort of regal trifles, which passed through his mind as transiently as they entered accidentally. He had no recourse to dissimulation; because as a brave man he despised it, and as an able man he did not want it: for though it may seem a paradox to the generality of readers, yet numberless people are dishonest merely for want of courage, or want of parts.

What hath been here slightly sketched out is not intended to pass upon the public by way of a character, but serves only as a plain enumeration of some few individuating circumstances, which induced me as an ecclesiastic to write Gustavus's life preferably to that of most other persons. For were I to delineate him in the other various appearances of the warrior, the politician, and private man of virtue (all which I chuse hereafter to leave the reader to combine from the several facts of history) it were impossible for me to confine myself within the common bounds of a slight preparatory introduction; since upon the whole he appears to me in every shape to be one of those great and fortunate human beings, whose reputation is neither to be advanced by encomiums, nor depreciated by obloquy. Quem vituperare ne inimici quidam possunt, nisi ut simul laudent.

My main view, therefore, in compiling this work, is an attempt to enforce the ideas and practice of virtue and religion upon that large body of men called the military. The object and moral of my book being only this, That the religious and good man (all other circumstances being supposed equal) stands the best chance to be bravest too. And if in composing the warlike parts of this work I have employed an unusual degree of exactness, attention, and accuracy, 'tis merely from a sincere and earnest desire of conveying the doctrine of my moral more dextrously into the human mind. Moderation, humanity, decorum, order, and above all the grand efficacy of a good example, are the salutary ingredients prescribed to the warrior; the description of war itself being only the vehicle artfully contrived in order to convey down less perceptibly the dose of virtue, which men have persuaded themselves to be more unpalatable than it really is, merely from the prevalence of custom and influences of prejudice. But my hope is, that I shall preserve the reader's attention awake through the whole course of my history ; and that the military youth of this kingdom may find the useful intermingled with the amusing ;

——— *Interea perpotet amarum
Absynthi laticem, deceptaque non capiatur :
Sed tali potius tactu recreata valescat.*

If, therefore, from the force of an example like that of Gustavus, I can display in new lights any fresh inducements (tending towards the promotion of virtue and religion) to that valuable part of the human species, the brave and magnanimous, I shall think my labours repaid to me with an accumulation of interest : and with all the fervour which the mind of man is capable of expressing towards the supreme Being, I sincerely pray, that my intentions may be answered in this important particular ! On the king's piety I ground the whole of my undertaking : otherwise, Totum hoc indictum volo.

The two greatest heroes * in the course of the present history, were the most moral and religious persons in the two respective armies. And though it may be objected that many wicked and fery men have been very brave, (which point I no ways controvert) yet the former can never contemplate death feriously and composedly; and it may be doubted of the latter, whether they possess that cool bravery, which preserves itself the same without the help of the irascible or vain-glorious appetites to goad it on: for, if courage be prompted by passion in any degree, and not by principle, it must be hurried and agitated more or less, which is a misfortune: the fire will be fierce, but not clear; and the transport counterworks that presence of mind which performs such wonders in the moments of danger, and without which, bravery in war (with respect to superior commanders) is little more than animal ferocity. All the great and magnificent that is performed in the field, is effected by that intuitive glance of the judgment, which our neighbours denominate neither inelegantly nor improperly the coup d'œil, though that idea falls far beneath the Greek expression Αγχίνοια; and I think 'tis plain to a demonstration, that the most tranquil and composed man (the reader will soon judge under which predicament such a person falls) stands always the best chance for snatching these critical and momentary opportunities. Nothing is so rapid as the flight of fortune; and if she is not seized by the wing, the very instant she glances by, the coy and capricious deity returns no more.

It grieves me likewise to say, that some military men, vainly and heedlessly suppose, that a contempt of religion, and a virtuous life, argues a certain greatness and intrepidity of soul. Little, alas! in this respect do they know their own hearts, or those of their neighbours! For the presumption being, that a man of the service is likewise a brave man, it is then manifest that this sort of conduct calls the owner's courage into question: for the coward, when danger is remote, is always most intrepid in his talk, most noisy, most insolent, and most prophane; nor is it an uncommon character to find the same man an hypocrite in valour, and an atheist in religion. Lord R. in the last age was an undeniable proof of this assertion, and daily observation confirms it oftner than one would wish to mention. The true hero feels no consciousness to prompt him to have recourse to a support so mean: any more than a beautiful and virtuous woman wants to enhance her charms by copying the taudry drefs and illiberal looks of a town-prostitute.

There is another circumstance in the life of Gustavus which deserves the attention of men of service. It is natural to imagine that the king's high spirit and personal courage can never be considered as points equivocal or problematical, yet he thought it beneath no warrior to decline a duel, and make his applications to the court of honour. He denounced death against all decisions of quarrels sword in hand; and upon one occasion shewed great presence of mind and inflexibility towards a couple of officers whom he respected respected extremely *. These circumstances being premised, can any person be uneasy concerning a proffered combat, when the great Gustavus despised the practice, and considered it more as matter of peevishness, and impotent passion, than any true mark of resolution and fortitude? Was not that prince jealous of the affairs of honour beyond all imagination? And if the rejection of a duel had predicated cowardice upon any human being, no worldly consideration could ever have replaced that man in the royal favour; but to return from this digression.

It may seem to some, that during the course of this work, I place the elector Palatin in too favourable a light: (not that I have omitted to spare him upon many occasions, and excuse him no where, but for countervailing reasons that amount to greater probability;) but be that as it will, if in the train of my narration I appear to speak of this unfortunate person with more respect and greater compassion than the tribe of historians is apt to do, I may assert truly and without vanity, it is because I know him better: nor can I allow a king to be branded with infamy, or hurried unnoticed down the stream of history, who made so extraordinary an effort in the cause of religion and liberty: (upon the effects of which effort the political laws of Europe have stood confirmed for more than a century) and from whose illustrious great-grandson, our present Sovereign, I now enjoy the privilege of imparting my sentiments to the public with the spirit and impartiality of a protestant truly-born, and gloriously protected!

Some people again may think that I have rather been too severe upon Charles I. and the ministers that served him: whereas, if they could but see how much I have expunged or passed slightly by, they would readily accuse me of inclining to the compassionate side. To say truth, I love to disturb no man's ashes, especially those of a king: he had a better criterion to appeal to, than the censure or praises of a modern historian; and to that criterion I shall consign him to stand or fall. Upon this account I have related things simply, without descanting upon them: nor can I charge my memory with having played the rhetorician upon any fact, or indulged the least acrimony or petulance of style. Whereas, if I had reasoned only upon the several false steps (to say the least of them) then taken with respect to the continent, or explained the various circumstances relative thereto in full detail; I might have swelled that single article to half the size of the history before us. It may suffice to have cut a sample off by way of present to my readers, and to have kept the remainder of the piece in my own hands.

Enough

Enough however is exhibited to convince the public, how little our historians know with regard to the affairs of the Palatinate ; tho' in truth they were the secret springs that gave motion and destination to all the politics of the latter part of James's reign, and the beginning of his son's. Nevertheless, the writers of my country merit praise, inasmuch as they applied themselves to work as long as their materials lasted : Till the better food of bread could be found, mankind was obliged to content itself with the ἀλις δρύς : However, it will appear from the course of this work, that numberless important truths, facts, and anecdotes, may be collected from the archives of foreign courts, from the negotiations of ministers then concerned with England, and from the historians of various nations who writ upon the memoirs of those very ministers, or had been allowed access to the respective cancellarias of their own country. A part of what lay within my power I embraced with thankfulness, and might have lived to have seen the better portion of the history of England completed, conformably to this plan, upon my own suggestion ; but the person who undertook the task, and had made considerable extracts from papers in foreign courts (those of Rusdorf particularly) is unfortunately no more *. And the reader may easily perceive, that every man is neither able to bear the expences of such an undertaking, or successful enough to procure the recom-

dations necessary ; which latter may avail but little, except he can insinuate himself into the good graces of the learned and knowing.

Carte boasts of executing wonders in this respect : we have the rhodomontade, but not the performance ; and indeed if he went to any magazine of intelligence (which may be a doubt) he questionless applied to the wrong ; for France had few materials to afford, and such as she had, sure I am, she would have with-holden from him. For have not all her voluminous treaty-collectors suppressed many pieces, which I have preserved, and she was ashamed of ? It will appear by examination, that I have hardly been able to borrow a single hint from this pompous writer's performance. One printed book out of his collection, relating to the affairs of the Palatinate, fell by chance into my hands ; and by the markings and interlineary dashes, it appears plainly that his design was to sacrifice Frederic and aggrandize the two English kings. He faggoted together just so much as made for his purpose, and left the rest in the state he had mangled it.

With respect to materials necessary to be used in composing a work like this, my misfortune hath been that they poured in upon me much faster than I had leisure or abilities to arrange them ; so that the great work of selecting and refusing,

fusing, constituted the most trying part of my labour. And this the reader will discover, not only in the affairs of the Empire, but even in the historical matters relative to England, which the confusion of our own civil wars (joined with an unparalleled negligence in the preservation of state-papers) soon contrived to throw into confusion; nor did the classics undergo more persecution from the Goths and Huns, than the British cancellaria suffered during the domination of the Prides and Hewsons.

I have cautiously restrained myself from affecting to bedeck my work with ambitiously-ornamental and high-laboured characters, tho' perhaps no writer hath resisted greater temptations in that respect; since the very out-lines of Gustavus, Pappenheim, Walstein, or Oxenstiern carry with them their own magnificence and individuating originality. Besides, there was also another circumstance which forcibly deterred me. I had reasons to expect the delineation of Gustavus (and that single incident might have saved the reputation of my history) completely drawn by a nobler hand; but ill-health rendered it impossible to realize that generous and most friendly engagement. Of course I shall modestly decline to touch the Cestus which Entellus had thrown down to the public. Characters weakly and solicitously dotted into the canvas by an unmasterly hand, are only mere glare and false painting; they are the copy of a fantastic writer's thoughts, thoughts, and those are but a copy. Nevertheless care has been taken to place the King's actions, religious, moral, political and military, in such ample and distinct lights in a sort of characteristical index, that the reader may be enabled with moderate judgment and little difficulty to combine a much better idea concerning him, than I can pretend to exhibit to his imagination.

With regard to the maps, care hath been taken to construct them on a new principle, merely relative to the present performance: so that the reader with a single glance will discover every town and river he wants to seek for: And this may be called an individuating principle of propriety; for as much as no other map corresponds to our purposes, and our maps can be adapted to no uses but those they supply at present. We flatter ourselves too, that the plans of battles are more clear and exact than have hitherto appeared: The place not only of every column and regiment, but of each smaller group of forces being expressly denoted; the squares bearing always a proportion to the number of combatants therein contained: and as no one can comprehend a battle (particularly those fought by Gustavus where the foot was intermingled amongst the horse upon a new principle) without knowing precisely where the infantry and cavalry were placed, we have esteemed it proper (and the designation may not be unuseful in future plans) to distinguish a body of the latter thus  and of the former thus . Nor do we owe this idea to Maréchal de Saxe; since many of my friends remember to have seen this discrimination in my drawings some years before the memoirs of that officer were made public.

As to the distances of places, and sums of money, we have calculated throughout the work by English measurement and computation; and have subjoined here and there an historical note, which contains some few striking particulars relating to personages of more immediate importance; and this I was induced to do, partly to give the reader a clearer idea of the subject in question, and partly because some circumstances did not intermix well with the series of my narration, or happened to fall out before or after the period I have confined myself to. Some other notes are interspersed sparingly up and down, relating to laws and terms in jus-publicism: the change of property since the peace of Münster; or other matters not unworthy of observation.

Nor may it turn to my disadvantage, that I have examined the ichnography of the principal scenes of action (especially the three great battles of the Lech, Leipzig, and Lützen) with all possible attention and diligence. And tho'

these assistances may be reckoned purely of a casual nature, yet thus much is certain, that no historian can describe an engagement with fidelity and veracity, except he has contemplated the ground-plot in his own proper person, or received his informations from one who has previously performed the self-same task.

Another circumstance cannot but be considered as peculiarly fortunate ; since few historians but myself have had the advantage of a chronological diary whereby to regulate and adjust their narration ; and yet except things follow one another in writing by the same order as they really took their rise, it is impossible to behold them in their due proportions. But by the assistance of the journals alluded to, it has been in my power to arrange every action in its right situation, which gives the whole a propriety of nature extremely beautiful, Quodcumque rei proprium est, id pulchrum est ; a circumstance most historians may wish for ardently, but unsuccessfully. Nevertheless it becomes not me to boast much of an advantage which took its rise from mere accident, and from whence no reputation can redound to me, except that of being a laborious and diligent searcher. Yet thus much is certain, that amidst such a mass of combined incidents and events, as the present work evidently containeth, there will be nothing of that historical and chronological magic,

Que

---Quæ modo nos Thebis, modo pono Athenis ;

all things will present themselves in proper series to the reader, like objects floating distinctly each after the other on the river of time ; or to depart from this poetical allusion, all things will succeed each other in their due periods and distances. What happened at one time will not be recounted as falling out at another : an embarrassment (in cases not so fortunately circumstanced as ours) which every historian who writes at a century's distance must feel much more than it is his interest to acknowledge : for he discovers in the cool revision of the closet that his incidents are more connected by proximity of page and paragraph than by the once-really existing order of nature : and of course, (at least to eyes of nicer discernment) where-ever the chronology of facts cannot be ascertained, there will always be some untoward awkwardness in the situations and connexions ; something

---Quod nequeo monstrare, & sentio tantum.

And here I must make a short apology for some few inaccuracies of the printer, as the greatest part of the work was wrought off during my absence at a considerable distance in the country : but I flatter myself the errors are such as can only be considered as typographical : --- And with respect to myself, if the style should appear less laboured and ornamental than is usually exhibited by the fluent writers of the present age, that deficiency must be attributed to my friends, who without embarrassing themselves with fact and matter, had the power to favour me with some enlivenings of the pen here and there; for indeed whilst my whole mind was occupied in composing, selecting and arranging the historical parts, I might be compared to a person walking on a precipice, who ran the risque of breaking his neck or limbs, if he stayed to gaze at a single flower or petrefication.

As this work is the result of a careful perusal and revision of near one hundred different authors, it can no ways be expected, that it agrees precisely in all circumstances with any single writer; yet more uniformly with the correct, than those that are less corrected. I have also had abundance of original memoirs as well as useful emendations imparted to me; and 'tis plain the intelligences conveyed to England at that period by lord Rea, Hepburn, Astley, and others, are more exact and scientific than the German historians can pretend to give; for none of them were men of service, and knew little of the actions they attempt to describe. In a word, abundance of errors are to be rectified, if a man be commonly master of the subject he undertakes. For example, when the whole herd of historians assure us, that Gustavus Horn performed wonders at Lützen, we know by the military

table constructed by us, that he then conducted an Army in Alfatia, and had just concluded the siege of Belfelden. Galas is represented as uncommonly active in the above-named battle, when at the very time he had a separate command on or near the frontiers of Lufatia. He is numbered likewise among the slain, yet gained the battle of Nordlingen in 1634, and died not till two years before the peace of Münster. Pappenheim (for the sake of verifying an old woman's prophecy) is related to have killed Gustavus hand to hand: whereas the king expired at eleven in the morning, and Pappenheim reached not the plains of Lützen till near four in the afternoon. It may suffice to repeat these few examples, relative to one single day's service, in order to shew, that if I depart from any man, it is for cogent and justifiable reasons: and hence 'twill appear, that when an historian thoroughly possesses his subject, after an examination and revision longer than Horace prescribes to works of imagination, it is not easy to impose a falsehood upon him, or a discordancy, or a contradiction. Yet, in despite of all precaution and vigilance, some errors will for ever intrude themselves upon us:

———Quos aut incuria fudit,
Aut humana parum cavit natura.———

And thus, 'till I had examined minutely the history of the period now before us, it had always been my custom to consider father Bougéant's account * with esteem and deference; nor was I unsparring in my encomiums upon it to my particular friends: nevertheless, upon a closer examination, it appears to me to be written in a manner very superficial and unsubstantial; since even the orthography of the names of warriors, politicians, towns, or rivers, are unknown to him; but in strict truth his true design (not the more excusable for being common) was only to make a fluent and pleasing narrative; and of course he laid three principal authors upon his table, two † that were not the best, and one ‡ extremely partial, verbose and frivolous. It may therefore safely be asserted, and consistently with modesty, that I have corrected him and supplied him in numberless places throughout the whole performance.

But Le Barre's history §, which contains only a short flying compendium of such transactions as fall within the reach of my design, is composed and arranged with that distinguishing distinguishing acumen which doth honour to an historian, and is recommended likewise by an extensive and intimate acquaintance with great variety of authors, whose names carry credit and authenticity with them. Upon the whole, if my work approacheth not to my own ideas, I am sensible it must arise from wanting hourly the kind assistance and supervision of two such friends as Mascou and Voltaire; the one would have opened the quarry for me, and the other would have taught me to have placed my materials like an architect.

In a word, every day of the king's life, after he entered Germany, hath cost me more than a treble day in recording its performances: for Gustavus conquered the empire in thrice less time than I composed the history of his conquests. So difficult it is with a king of Sweden in the last age, or a king of Prussia in the present century, to make the pen keep pace with the sword.

ON THE MILITARY STATE of EUROPE, IN THE Former Part of the Seventeenth CENTURY.

CONTAINING

The MANNERS and CUSTOMS of the AGE ; and relating particularly to the History of the Life of GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS.

THE state of war and customs of life were so different in the century I am treating of from what they are at present, that it appears necessary to me to give the reader some previous intelligences before I conduct him into an immense and perplexed labyrinth of history ; great part of the scene whereof lies in a country which knows England much better than England is acquainted with Germany.

Some slight essay of this kind may not be improper, inasmuch as I am describing a war and negotiations as highly interesting as any that are to be found either in ancient or modern history : And yet the more considerable portion thereof took its rise from an imperceptible, and, as some thought, a very contemptible beginning ; from an obscure potentate in the north ; a prince unheard of, or unnoticed in the European system ; a king of snow, now, as the language then ran at the court of Vienna; whose dissolution was pronounced unavoidable long before the expiration of the summer-beats *.

Yet this seemingly unexisting monarch, at the head of thirteen thousand virtuous and well-disciplined men, created and modelled to the very form they afterwards appeared in, ventured not only to cross the ocean, but to invade an immense hostile country, and oppose himself to a vast quantity of the best troops then in the world; a set of warriors whom an habit of twelve years uninterrupted victory had rendered terrible and ferocious; sharpened by hardships, long-practised in all the arts of military discipline, and rendered cruel and insolent by accustomed exactions, depopulations, and military executions; conducted by a general whose fires the frost of age could not extinguish, though grown grey in experience and the arts of stratagem; one who in a word had shaded his aged temples with the laurels of thirty-six remarkable victories, and conjointly with him served a set of illustrious commanders, whose very names infused respect and caution even into Gustavus himself. Yet prudence, patience, order, moderation, humanity, benignity, morality, and religion (all supported by the clearest courage that can be imagined) soon pervaded and overturned this mighty mass of men and things: And though the emperor at first could have marched against Gustavus four or five considerable armies, for he and the leaguers had then no less than nine, including the troops before Mantua; (not to mention more than one hundred garrisons placed in various cities and fortresses): Yet our monarch, in the space of twenty-nine months, possessed all that immense tract, which extends from the borders of Hungary and Silesia to the banks of the Rhyne, and from the lake of Constance to the Baltic ocean.

The discipline between the respective contending forces was widely different: For the Imperialists had been corrupted by long prosperity. In a word, making the single exception of courage, they were just the reverse of the Swedes. One uniform undisturbed succession of conquests had rendered them audacious, avaricious, and cruel; and, which was still worse, just before Gustavus's arrival, no inconsiderable part of the veteran infantry had been disbanded for reasons of state, and that was a loss which future industry could never possibly recover. Those who remained, affected terror in their looks, and cruelty in their actions; and though they had seen and performed great things, yet were obliged to submit to younger and less experienced men, merely because they were more moral, more virtuous, and better disciplined: For the camp of Gustavus was a school of order, decency, and religion. The little sort of a court that was kept in it, knew nothing of servility, flattery, intrigues, or low meannesses. The king lived well with all his soldiers, and knew them all. No cavalier came into his service, but he demanded of his officers a full and exact account of their opinions concerning him, and did the same again and again after they had tried him.

When he invaded Germany he had his eyes fixed on all the soldiers in Europe who were then retired from service, and amongst others writ to the Baron de Sirot with his own hand.—He was temperate in food, and rather abstemious than otherwise in respect to wine, often declaring, with a smile on his countenance, That he came not to conquer the Germans by hard drinking.

Luxury was a stranger in his camp, and so was gaming. The nobility and the rich made no expences but for the honour of the service, and the younger officers in point of dress never went beyond neatness and propriety. The common men had a full confidence either of overcoming the enemy by dint of valour and discipline in the field of battle, or wearying them out and reducing their numbers by virtue of judicious incampments and marches, and by being able to support themselves with greater moderation and frugality; for they could continue three months in those very quarters where the Imperialists could but barely subsist themselves one third part of the time. Their hardiness of constitution was such, that they could extend the duration of a campaign almost equal to that of the year, being alike patient of summer-heat and winter-cold. Their camp was their home, their inn, their farm; their city, and their country. In the course of the wars, numbers came to bear arms, who had been born and educated in the field, and had seen no other profession than that of the sword and musquet. One would think an army no very excellent school either for learning to read, or apprehending one's duty to God: Yet Gustavus, and the Swedish generals after his decease, had a particular attention to these points: Public schools were opened every day with the same regularity and quiet as in a country town; and the moment the forces began to intrench themselves the children went to a safe and peaceable quarter, marked out for their place of application. One day, contrary to the expectation of the general, who allotted them their ground, a cannon-ball happened to pierce through the school, and killed two or three young people at a single stroke; but the rest, far from quitting their places, neither changed colour nor dropped a pen or a book from their hands*. Thus they became habitually intrepid from the cradle, and had an education far superior to that of the Lacedemonian youth.

In the exercise of the field, neither serjeants nor corporals could be more vigilant or less sparing of their labour than Gustavus. One thing is remarkable, he was strict to his officers and mild to the private men. It was a principle with him, that even a common soldier should rarely if ever receive corporal punishment; fully persuaded that such a disgrace cast a damp afterwards upon his vivacity, and agreed not well with the notions which an high spirit ought to entertain of honour. It was his idea, that a man of bravery would sooner forgive a sentence of death, inflicted upon him by a court-martial, than pass by the scandal of a blow in oblivion. His general rule therefore was to degrade or banish.

In field-reviews or private exercises he chose always as much as possible to be present. There was scarce a private man of uncommon resolution in his whole army (which consisted of combined troops from various nations) whom he could not call promptly by his name. The attention of his eye was so accurate, (though his eye-sight was none of the best) that in a general muster of a regiment he hardly passed by a single individual unnoticed: And, if the meanest of the performers happened to be deficient in their exercises, he would dismount from his horse various times successively, and without peevishness or upbraiding discharge the operation in question for them, and command them to make their observations thereon.

These troops were never apt to desert, the world being an immense wilderness unknown to them; and besides they could gain a subsistence in no profession but that of arms. The horse-boys of the cavalry (who were usually some years in their apprenticeship, and served in an inferior manner during the time of action) were generally chosen to replace their masters: Thus every man rose by degrees, and perfected himself by subordination and long experience. Hence it happened that the loss of the commanding officers in some sharp engagements rarely discomposed a Swedish regiment (a thing frequent enough in other armies) for half the corps was just as capable to take the command as those who preceded and had given them laws. There were but two means of advancement, seniority (which was sometimes superseded) and merit: Birth, quality, and court-friends availed nothing; so that the world can hardly expect to behold a similar army, except it be at remote and unfrequent intervals; formed by a monarch equally brave, moral, and religious, and nurtured by him for twenty years with all the care that a parent educates a single child: The same plan was observed ved more or less by his generals till the conclusion of the peace of Westphalia; and this body of troops from the year 1612 to 1648 had hardly ever tasted a single month's repose. The regulations, order, and discipline of Julius Cæsar can bear no comparison with the correct emendations, harmonious adjustment, and religious decency of Gustavus.

Every regiment had two chaplains, who received then forty pounds a year apiece in our present money. They were governed by a consistory of their own order; and, being men judiciously chosen, were respected by the principal commanders and beloved by the soldiery; yet their authority was such, that they discountenanced and suppressed all profane swearing and drunkenness; nor was the camp filled with vagrants, thieves, and prostitutes, as usually happened in the Imperial service.

Thus by a habit of discipline, morality, and piety, adjoining thereto a constant experience in matters of war, the Swedish army (at least in Gustavus's days) was rendered next to invincible, and became the most respectable body of troops then in Europe: For not long before Gustavus's death the Swedes possessed near three hundred strong towns and fortresses in the empire; and it was possible to dine in one of them and sleep in another, from the middle of Silesia to the western banks of the Rhyne, and from the lake of Constance to the Baltic ocean.

It no-where appears that the troops of Gustavus wanted pay, though that prince was extremely moderate and merciful in the affair of contributions; insomuch that the Conquered (if we set aside their prejudices to the Romish religion) usually preferred the Swedish government to their own hereditary constitution. Yet the astonishing point still remains: How, for example, and by what methods, Gustavus maintained and raised his numerous armies? Nor is it in my power to explain fully (and not superficially) from whence this monarch derived his resources; for most readers may conjecture what the riches of Sweden might be under his administration ; nor can they be ignorant that the king had been engaged in an uninterrupted invasive war from the seventeenth year of his age to his dying moments ; so that his ways and means of acquiring money will be ever inexplicable to posterity more or less ; as will be likewise his œconomy and punctuality of payments : And so much the more as it nowhere appears that his soldiers once mutinied for their deficiency of stipend.

It may be objected, that in the course of the war he received great supplies from neighbouring and extraneous princes ; but, though this may be said, it is not so capable of being demonstrated ; the amount of their subscriptions being to a certain degree determinable without much difficulty. Nevertheless, supposing that to be as it will, what shall we say of his conduct the very Christmas after he invaded Germany, having then received (so far as we know) only sixty thousand pounds from England : It being natural to conclude that France did not pay her annual stipend of one hundred thousand pounds till the treaty was signed by which it was conveyed ? Yet at the very time in question he had (besides a considerable marine in which were five thousand inrolled and regular sailors) an excellent army on foot, consisting of seventy-one thousand two hundred combatants, and had likewise issued out commissions to levy ten thousand six hundred fresh men.

In addition to the œconomy of supporting an army it may be remarked further, That his majesty was also an exact and punctual observer both of public and private devotions ; and ordered a set of military prayers to be drawn up and used constantly at the head of each regiment every day. I have seen about two and twenty of them, and many amongst them are of no inconsiderable length.

His rules of discipline were admirable both in a moral and military sense : They are a perfect code or system. He composed this work as early as in the twenty-eighth year of his age, when he made his expedition against Riga. These regulations he enlarged and rendered more complete when he invaded Germany, and added to them occasionally, according as the insolence and irregularity of his soldiers rendered fresh provisions necessary: As particularly happened when he took New Brandenburg by storm; for he then inserted twenty fresh articles relative to that tumultuous affair.

In the perfective parts of war Gustavus made a greater progress than any general before or since his time. The world had never seen a fine field-disposition till the day the battle of Leipzig was fought. His idea was, that every army should be considered like a fortified town; supplied in such manner with assistances and reinforcements as to be enabled to act offensively or defensively: That there should be supports behind supports, and passages of communication and relief, to be fed regularly with as much exactness as the circulation of the blood is distributed through the canals of the human body; his grand object being, that, though particular divisions might be thrown into disorder, yet that no confusion should prove universal. It was he who had the first notion of cloathing men well, and keeping them clean and warm; whereas Tilly's doctrine was, A ragged soldier and a bright musquet, following a false maxim of the ancients, Horridum militem esse decet. In military architecture and the duties of an engineer he exceeded all his cotemporaries, and despised the Low-Country method of drawing up great incoherent bodies of troops in square masses, commonly called Tertias; forasmuch as originally they made up a third of the main body or centre. He reduced the huge regiments, which consisted formerly of two or three thousand men, to twelve hundred, and afterwards to one thousand and eight, in order to distribute more officers among the soldiery, and multiply the posts of preferment for brave men. He allotted also four surgeons to every regiment; but there is reason to think that the Imperialists had none; since Tilly himself, after the battle of Leipzig, was obliged

In the creative or inventive branches of war, we must attribute to Gustavus the discovery of the brigade or column, the doctrine of firing in platoons, and the use of leathern portable artillery; (since discontinued, for reasons to us unknown.) To him we owe likewise a new partizan (long lost in oblivion, but thought by many to be more efficacious and less incumbering than the bayonet) the sea-boom, the formation of dragoons, and the substitution of pouches in the place of bandileers. The infinite variety of evolutions took its rise from him; and to him we owe the demonstration that a short cannon will give the ball a larger range. It was he that first divided his men into little distinct pelotons, and gave them officers accordingly. He considered space as the parent of order, and always allowed sufficient ground-plot for rectifying confusions. He was the first who intermingled infantry in the intervals betwixt the horse, which broke the formidable impresson of the ponderous Austrian cuirassiers, a set of men then deemed irresistible: And, as brave regiments were often cut to pieces almost to a man, (choice and discrimination being likewise necessary for carrying on more particular designs) he devised the expedient of draughting soldiers from separate corps (who were then called commanded men) which first gave rise to the formation of brigades and battalions. It was his original idea probably, that a body of infantry could resist an equal number of cavalry upon most emergencies: And it was he first thinned the immoderate depth of ranks, and consequently brought more hands to engage in the hour of battle: — Yet one thing is very extraordinary: Though each of his generals was properly speaking a favourite pupil, nurtured by him; and though his enemies were constant eye-witnesses to every branch of his military conduct; yet the art of war declined from his death, till the time that Montecuculi and Turenne revived it in part, conformably to the principles of the great inventor.—Nor must we neglect the extraordinary advantages he extracted from winter-campaigns; which may be considered partly as a new military practice: And it was from the same principle, that he gave little or no countenance to councils of war; for it was his reserved private ambition that every operation should pass upon the soldiery for his own invention.

* I have been informed the Austrians had no regular surgeons in their regiments till about the year 1718.

Amidst the perfective branches of his warlike profession, may be mentioned his excellent methods of cloathing and subsisting armies, and the punctuality of his payments; his exact discipline, sobriety, industry, and perpetual reviewing his troops; the great improvement of his marine forces, and the manufacture of arms which he erected in Sweden; to which may be added his new and uncommon skill in all sorts of military architecture, as likewise in constructing bridges, erecting batteries, and in all the arts of intrenchments, sieges, mining, incampments, debarkations, and battles. It was he that first improved the field-service of the horse, and transported infantry behind the cavalry. It was he that first reduced war to a system of tactics and religion; and, lastly, it was he that regulated the fire of the cavalry, and shortened their musquets into carabines. It was he that changed the incumbrance of armour into head and breast-pieces, reformed the matchlock, and abolished the long pike and pike-rests.

And, if I may digress a moment, it may suffice to observe, that, as to the king's peculiar notions and practices in politics, his great abilities in treaties, manifestos, speeches, and letters, his personal bravery, presence of mind and firmness, his just spirit of resentment and sense of honour, his generosity and bounty, politeness and courtesy, his humanity, moderation, compassion, and above all his religion and piety; if (I say) we were to give the reader a true delineation of him, in all these illustrious particulars, we could do little less than transcribe the numberless passages which he will peruse in more full detail in every part of the ensuing work: Yet one thing is incontestable, and must never be forgotten; there is a certain extemporaneous spirit and pointedness in his speeches and replies, which always carries its own authenticity therewith, and can never belong to another man. Wit he had none, or affected to neglect it; nevertheless he had all the acumen both of a refined and forcible imagination, attempered with justness and solidity.

The state of war in those days differed in many respects from what it is at present. Most conflicts of consequence were decided by the sword, an implement in the present age almost intirely useless. The science of fortification was then in its infancy. Towns were besieged and defended with fewer cannons than are made use of now; being in general protected only from the insults of plunderers. The art of a campaign therefore consisted in giving decisive battles and possessing the passes and navigable rivers; by which means the fortified towns submitted of course; nevertheless all parties confided much in their artillery. Tilly and Gustavus battered some places with incredible fury, and made use of pieces of a very considerable size. The former erected many large batteries at the battle of Leipzig, and Walfstein was not defectively provided at that of Lützen.

The generals marched their troops with greater spirit and expedition than hath been customary since. The common march of the infantry was sixteen and eighteen miles a day. In a journal of each day's loco-motion, which a Scottish regiment made for six years successively, I find that quantity to establish the medium; and, to calculate more favourably, allow the German mile to be only four English miles and an half. In cases of emergency and importance, it was usual to stretch the journey to twenty-two miles: Thus by the above-mentioned diary one corps of troops (which rested three months after Gustavus's death) marched in four years three thousand five hundred and fifteen miles ; and by the way it must be observed, that the fire-arms at that time were much heavier than they are at present. Amongst some particulars in the age we are speaking of, it may here be noted, that the loss of the colours in a respective regiment or company, absolved the military oath to the last master. Generals sent romantic challenges for themselves and armies by a trumpeter, with invitation to meet each other on equal ground ; and war was denounced by an herald, conformably to the ancient laws of chivalry. Ecclesiastics clothed themselves in steel without ceremony ; excommunicated by the Pope when against him, and laden with benedictions when they served on his side. No European general from the time Charles V. besieged Metz till Wallstein lay incamped near Nuremberg, had seen himself at the head of fifty thousand fighting men. Armies were then of a more manageable size, and subdivided into separate ones, which of course gave rise to a plentiful harvest of generals, and afforded men, from the highest to the lowest, an opportunity of seeing as much service in one campaign, as they now behold in all their lives. For the operations in these little transactions are more in detail, yet comprehended at the same time with greater facility.

It was a saying of Gustavus, that he never desired to place himself at the head of more than forty thousand men ; [paying no regard to a military maxim equally profane and insubstantial, namely, that the supreme Being always favours the greater squadrons ;] That a larger number of troops was only matter of parade and incumbrance, inasmuch as no general could compel him, in the aforementioned circumstances, to accept a battle except he chose it, whilst in the interim he could dispose of superfluous forces to better advantage elsewhere. Concurrently with what is here asserted, it was the opinion both of duke d'Alva and Turenne, that no army ought to consist of more than fifty thousand men ; and the former used always to say, that veteran troops were the bones and muscles of the military body, body, and that new-raised recruits only filled up the interstices with shape and plumpness.

Whereas on the contrary it was the custom, in the last war which England was engaged in, and we may thank our neighbours the French for prescribing the fashion (who know their men to be less robust than ours, and perceive likewise, other circumstances being supposed equal, that the superior weight and pressure of troops will decide the day by squeezing the ranks into disorder) to bring two immense armies into the field, who gaze at each other for a whole summer; of which the event is, if each general be endued with parts, that it is next to impossible to bring on a decisive engagement, without incurring extreme hazard; and, what is still more, matters will be brought to an event, not by the men, but by the bare machinery of the artillery. Thus only one general is formed in a country, and if he dies the loss is irreparable.

It may be objected, that if our opponents have an inclination to act this part, the party assailed must then be obliged to face them with an equal body of troops: But this, with submission, is a mistake of the state of the question. Great commanders are tied up to no such rules, and his Prussian Majesty, not dissatisfied to imitate Gustavus in most things, has subdivided his armies in the same manner as that prince would do were he now living. If one general portions out his troops with proper precaution, the other will be compelled to follow the example. Wallstein, who first invented this method of waging war, played the artifice upon Gustavus; for he wanted, like our dextrous neighbours, to protract the time, and plunge his enemies into enormous expences, which is true policy with respect to opposing any army that carries on a war out of its own country: But Gustavus despised the futility of this stratagem, and though he had only eighteen thousand men, wherewith to confront above fifty thousand, yet he allowed three separate bodies of his own troops to range freely throughout the empire, and intrenched himself under the beard of the Imperial general, who in the event was obliged to decamp, and take such cards as the Swedish monarch was pleased to deal him.

Nevertheless, such readers as examine the history of Gustavus with attention and correct observation, will soon perceive, that whenever any overgrown and enormous potentate on the continent aims at nothing less than absolute dominion over the whole European system, that it then becomes indispensably necessary, even for remote princes, separated from the affair in question by the intervention of the ocean, to support the balance of power in the greater world, be the expences and hazard as extraordinary as imagination can represent them to us: For the evils and incroachments of universal monarchy resemble the undulations caused by a large stone thrown into a cistern of water, whose surface is of a certain diameter,—they will touch the extreme rim at last. And, had Gustavus allowed the Imperialists to make themselves masters of Pomerania, Mechlenberg, and such sides of the Baltic as lie opposite to Sweden, it is certain that Wallstein would soon have rendered himself supreme arbiter of the northern ocean: So that if Sweden had not acted the offensive part in 1630, she might have felt a raging war kindled in her own vitals long before the year 1640.

For these reasons we are at a loss which to admire most, the bravery or the prudence of Gustavus in forcing the war to rekindle itself upon the continent with a fresh degree of fury. His senators, almost to a man, approved after some little reflexion this glorious effort, and the common people embarked in the expedition with as much zeal and promptness as if it had been another crusade. But, as this subject may appear to many as a sort of disquisition ad invidiam, it may suffice for me to have transiently touched upon it (inasmuch as it gives a high finishing to the king's character) and leave the rest to work its way on the reader's better judgment.

the knowledge thereof been unuseful to our jus-publicists, when the French exclaimed so outrageously against our commencing hostilities in Europe without some declaration of war in form. Gustavus, in a case parallel, after long and sedate reflection, determined to enter Germany without conveying any denunciation of an attack to the court of Vienna * : For he considered the Imperial actions as a very forcible sort of language ; nor hath posterity ever decried the propriety or justice of his Majesty's conduct.

But I am obliged to a clear-sighted and excellent author † for some other reasons (unnoticed hitherto by historians) which induced Gustavus to enter Germany. "It must be remembered," saith he, "that as the English and Venetians in ancient times laid claims immemorial to certain portions of ocean, so likewise the Swedish nation formed uncontroverted pretensions to a large part of the Baltic sea : " And when the irresistible progress of the Imperial forces (supported at all times by a Spanish navy more considerable in those days than ours) had possessed the whole intermediate tract of shore from Dantzic to Lubec ; When mariners were inrolled, ships constructed, and Walsstein himself had requested to be declared high admiral of the north ; — Surely it was due time and season for a spirited and magnanimous prince like Gustavus (removing for the present all other separate considerations and inducements) to restrain the audacious incroachments of the house of Austria, and vindicate the then-expiring rights and commerce of his faithful subjects.

But to return from a slight digression not unpardonable in an Englishman. The reader will be surpris'd when I tell him that the pay of those days was more considerable than one may be apt to imagine. Nor must we dissemble that here and there the commanders on the Swedish side (to the great regret of their royal master) contrived to levy some separate contributions for their own uses, and now and then filtered away a little from what had been collected by them under the sanction of public authority. But these examples were rare, and resented with severity whenever discovered.

Whilst the king's officers lived decently and comfortably, the Imperial commanders led lives of magnificence. Those of prime distinction (especially before Gustavus arrived) affected the expence and grandeur of princes, and had very often a company of cuirassiers or infantry, by way of guards, of which some supplied the place of aids de camp: Many colonels kept their coaches in the camp, eat on plate, had an ambition to possess abundance of servants and horses, and commonly maintained a secretary, partly for state and partly for use. And as to contributions, they raised them to degrees alike unmerciful and immeasurable.

In the Swedish camp it is true matters were conducted with greater frugality; yet I have seen an account of a funeral procession, performed for a Bohemian colonel in that service, which was expensive and pompous enough for a crowned head, and that in the very infancy of the war.

A colonel of a Swedish regiment of infantry, when Gustavus entered Germany, received about three hundred and eighty pounds per annum; the lieutenant-colonel was paid in the half-proportion, and a captain was allowed one hundred and twenty-eight pounds a year. To the officers military and civil were allotted one hundred and forty-two servants, who all did duty, but received seven-pence a week less than the common soldiers, whose pay amounted to a small matter under six-pence a day: And in cases of emergency, if the service required, it was Gustavus's custom to advance them a third of their monthly pay, one payment being made on the eleventh, another on the twenty-first, and the residue at the end of the month; and what is remarkable, there was an officer, or a sort of superior at least, allotted allotted to every combination of five or six men throughout the infantry.

It is true the Imperial pay, at least amongst the generals and colonels, ran much higher than the Swedish; but then it was subjected to extraordinary defalcations, retardments, and stoppages; so that upon the whole the lesser annual stipend was most convenient and most profitable. And here I speak of the Imperial troops at the period when Gustavus by his excellent discipline had forced the emperor to take some new measures, in consequence of the opinions given by the electoral college at the dyet of Ratisbon; for before that time every general and soldier, without having regard to the salary of the service, extorted from the poor citizens and peasants all that could be amassed by rapine and cruelty. Upon the footing of the new regulation*, a colonel of cavalry (the regiments being extremely large) was allowed near eight hundred pounds a year, and the lieutenant-colonel two hundred pounds. The pay of the same officers amongst the infantry was near one fourth less: The stipend of a common cuirassier was about eleven pence per day, and the moiety of that sum made the diurnal provision for a foot-soldier.

Thus the wages of the common men in both services being pretty near the same, Gustavus who knew how to seize every relative advantage, contented himself with giving his officers less stipend and easier duty, and creating just double the number that was to be found amongst his enemies. Hence it was that he appeared to be better served, and had more frequent opportunities of paying attention to merit. Nor must we forget here, that a common foot-soldier amongst the Swedes (besides some allowance for bread, and with no deductions from his pay, so far as we can learn) received three shillings and three farthings per week, or thereabouts.

The generals and colonels in those days made no great ceremony of passing from one service to another, which happened more frequently, as it was difficult to do themselves justice by way of duel. We do not find that kings or princes reclaimed their officers upon these occasions; nor were they put to death when the fortune of war threw them into the hands of their former masters, provided nothing could be laid to their charge except declining the service.

Prisoners were exchanged but very rarely, there being no established cartel of conditions; and as the ransom belonged to the party seizing, exchange in this case was considered as a robbery; which made the emperor pay Verdugo four thousand pounds in order to get the young prince of Anhalt into his own hands. Men of consequence were detained ratione convenientiæ: This happened particularly to Gustavus Horn and John de Wert, whom the Imperialists and French kept in their power many years, not chusing to discharge them till the peace of Münster appeared to be in some forwardness. Officers less illustrious always paid their ransom: That of a colonel amounted sometimes to about one thousand pounds, and of the higher and lower commanders in proportion.

To repeat the several depopulations of fire and sword, the plunderings and extortions, the acts of cruelty and inhumanity, the massacres and violations during the period of the thirty years wars, would be an endless as well as disgusting undertaking. It may suffice to observe in general, that the party who dealt most in those deeds of ferocity proved likewise the most unprosperous, and rendered themselves more odious to those of their own religious profession than their adversaries could be: Whereas it was a maxim with Gustavus (to which his practice was always conformable) that the truly brave soldier had no need to commit any acts of cruelty in terrorem. He considered war as dreadful enough in its own nature and consequences; and thought it became the man of service, and the Christian to mollify its severities rather than heighten them. It was his turn of mind and earnest desire to mix as much religion and benignity with these

these operations, as the circumstances of the thing could admit of: He made humanity and generosity the two criterions of bravery: And it was a doctrinal point with him; that something of the liberal man must complete the character of the warrior: For which reason he had the last-mentioned distinction always upon his lips (which he laboured incessantly to infuse into his troops from the highest to the lowest) and ever drew a line of partition between punishment and barbarity, contributions and extortions, legal restrictions and persecutions; and, in a word, between the soldier and the ruffian, the civilized being and the assassins.

The Swedish army had two regular courts-martial; one for each regiment, and one in general for the examination of superior commanders: Yet the officers had acquired such an habitude of performing their duty, that in the course of twenty-eight years, namely, from the siege of Riga till the peace of Münster, one can hardly discover the traces of any trials on account of military misbehaviour, excepting those of the colonels Horneck and Mitzval, one of whom Gustavus spared, contrary to Oxenstiern's inclinations; though he thought fit to punish the other, notwithstanding the queen made great intercession in his behalf.

In campaigns that consisted merely or principally of incampments, marches, and counter-marches, the Swedes in the long-run always ruined the Imperialists, being more patient of fatigue, and accustomed to greater moderation and frugality. Upon these principles Gustavus made the famous incampment against Wallstein near Nurenberg; and hence it arose that Galas saw three or four fine armies moulder away to nothing. From the superiority of the Swedes, Melander, one of the ablest generals in Europe, would have been undone, in the year 1646, if the elector of Bavaria (contrary to all faith of treaties) had not brought him off, by allowing John de Wert to desert at the head of four thousand cavalry.

There were very few generals then in an army.—The power and place of a Commander in chief all men comprehend at the first sound: Under him served one lieutenant-general, being properly speaking his vicegerent, who received orders from him in the day of battle, and in his absence took the supreme command: (But this post of employment seems to have been considered as partly superfluous, about the time Gustavus entered the empire:) Next ranked the Velt-maréchal, whose business it was to receive the plans of engagement from the generalissimo, and select the ground. And here I must make a little remark on my neighbours the French, who copying fervilely the German, or rather latinized German historians, suppose the Velt-maréchal (in the thirty years wars) and Commander in chief to be terms convertible: Whereas Velt-maréchal (Campi-Magister, vel Marechallus) denoted then no other commander than what I have described: Next came the general of artillery, the serjeant-major di battaglia *, the general of horse, the general of infantry, the commissary-general, the quarter-master-general, and the muster-master-general. Now, few points in the present history have given me more vexation than this arrangement: For in short the customs of the two services were different, since it is certain that Pappenheim, after the king of Sweden's landing, acted in the character of lieutenant-general to Tilly; and Holk (not to disoblige the former officer) was appointed deputy lieutenant-general under him. Nor do I recollect to find any equivalent in terms for the watch-master-general †, who occurs so frequently on the Imperial side; and of course the disposition here alluded to must be considered as Swedish; since (having no other lights) I was obliged to derive my rank of precedence from the prescribed form of sitting in one of Gustavus's grand councils of war.—Next came the eldest colonels; with a reserve of giving place to those of the guards : And in the Imperial establishment it must be observed, that the Croats had always a general of their own chusing.

Yet it doth not appear that this rank of honour took place indispensably in the time of action : For every general (the two first excepted) was considered partly as a person mechanically adapted to the machinery of a battle : One was supposed to be the best cannoneer, another to understand best the marshalling of the infantry, a third the drawing up of the cavalry, and so in other departments : But the fighting part was sometimes committed to the best hands ; and many colonels in the hour of engagement took the command of honour before several generals ; and this may be slightly remarked in the battles of Leipzig and Lützen *. Not that such practices were very frequent : Nevertheless, an experienced colonel in those days was a very powerful and respectable personage. Nor did the command of a separate army necessarily constitute a general : Pechman had the sole management of seven thousand men against the Danish and Weymarian forces ; Holk conducted eight thousand troops in the first irruption he made into Misnia ; Arnheim commanded a body of ten thousand soldiers in the Polish war ; and yet each at that time, though invested with the supreme authority, was only a colonel.

Turenne made Gustavus and Wallstein his models in this respect : He could not bear to see a general of horse at the head of a body of infantry, merely because he was the senior commander ; and so convertibly, when an officer of foot was transferred for the same reasons to the conducting a wing of cavalry : And of course banished from his army all disputes concerning rank and priority of commission. If talents are not thus developed, at least now and then ; and their point of activity well-directed ; the self-same man may succeed in matters of astonishing difficulty, and miscarry in others, which demand what may hardly merit to be called mere common capacity :

“ And

“ And thus,” saith the chevalier de Folard on the occasion,
 “ an inferior general, to whom every-thing is made a depart“ ment by the mere mechanism of age and rank, may be com“ pelled at length to imitate the lawyer, who perceiving he lost “ every just and reasonable cause, undertook for the future none
 “ but what were notoriously defective both in title and equity.”

I have not mentioned these facts by way of invidious comparison, but purely to render the knowledge of the history more intelligible. Some readers may be pleased with the remark, as most men have vanity enough in reserve to suppose themselves possessed of merit capable to counterbalance all pretensions of seniority. Nevertheless, my own private opinion is (if that can be of any weight) that seniority of command in general is the safest, quietest, and most prudent method of conferring honour, being less liable to exceptions and inconveniencies than any other rule which human wit can devise upon the occasion.

But to pass from a subject which may be supposed (though very unjustly) to carry with it some tincture of malignity. Quitting one service for another was not considered then so much in the light of an action of baseness as it is at present; and the reason was, that as officers received frequent injuries, real and imaginary from their superiors, and had not power to make their cause good at their respective courts, nor opportunity nor means to appeal to that false decision of justice called a duel, they retired from the service in high disgust (the enemy being always ready to receive them with open arms) and sometimes dispensed with themselves from the ceremony of taking a formal leave. The manners and circumstances of the age gave a sanction to this sort of practice; and few or none were ever called to an account for it, except some manifest treachery or treason could be laid to their charge, as was the case of colonel Farenbach, Velt-maréchal Cratz, and some others.

But to advance to a subject equally interesting; most of the great men in those days (for some from the very condition and nature of the service we find to be wholly illiterate) were alike equal in the field and in the cabinet. Gustavus never once gave Oxenstiern the lead in matters of politics. Nay, it was his private delight in hours of amusement to engage the politician with an host of arguments, and dispute the field with him inch by inch. And when the statesman, meeting his master at Mentz, made him the invidious and venomously refined compliment of telling him, that he expected to have paid his court to him on the occasion at Vienna (sure, as he thought, in this one circumstance to have caught the king in a false step) Gustavus convinced him, in an instant, that he had ill-comprehended the point in question, and forced him to acknowledge his mistake in silence and blushes. The most difficult, delicate, abrupt, and important treaty, during Gustavus's appearance in Germany, was that which passed between him and the elector of Saxony, some days before the battle of Leipzig; yet it was concluded in the absence of the minister, and without his knowledge: And though Oxenstiern got great fame from his conduct at the convention of Hailbrun, 1633, yet he only executed a plan which Gustavus had sketched out a few weeks before his death. Not that I would be thought to depreciate the reputation of the great Rix-chancellor: He did enough after his master's decease to merit the character of the first prime-minister in the world.

But to return to the convertibility of the political and military capacity in that age. The politician I am speaking of commanded several armies with great prudence, and gave laws to Poland with an handful of soldiers. In the only good picture I ever saw of him, he is cloathed in armour from head to foot; and there is something in his eyes which, though the painter hath described, I cannot; and the very print of him by Mierfelt is superior to most things I ever observed in the engraving way. He had the sciolto viso to a degree that is inexpressible. Richelieu assumed the baton too on certain occasions:

casions : Took Pignerol, and conquered all the province round it. The duke d'Angoulesme was general of horse. The ambassadors De Charnacé and De Brezé were both colonels of regiments : They attended Gustavus in the field all day, and conferred with him at night on matters of politics. Torstenson was concerned at Stockholm in civil employs, and yet Banier bequeathed his army to him as the only person capable to conduct it. On the other hand, Mansfelt over-reached the Ditrichsteins, the Olivares, and the Gondamars more than once. Walstein had served in both capacities ; and Tilly in effect held the pen at the peace of Lubec. Gabriel Bethlem and Arnheim had more resources and artifices than two attorneys. Horn and Banier concluded the treaty at Bernwalt, and the former of the two was afterwards sent ambassador to Louis XIII.

Old Thurn divided his life betwixt war and embassy : At the head of troops in the summer ; in winter either at Venice or Constantinople. Pappenheim could never be spared from the field ; but in acumen of parts was thought equal to the very best of his cotemporaries ; and the letter he writ to the duke of Bavaria after the defeat of Leipzig (which I have perused by chance, but where or how hath escaped my memory) shews him to have been a person critically able upon the greatest emergencies, and that he understood the relative strength of Gustavus and the empire far better than the interior council at Vienna could pretend to do. Aldringer was in effect political historiographer of the empire : The manifesto's, deductions, justificatory pieces, and little fugitive satires and invectives chiefly flowed from his pen. Duke Bernard of Saxe-Weymar's project of securing Alsatia from the paws of France, espousing the land-graves of Hesse Cassel, and giving down to his posterity the glory of possessing a dominion that made the barrier between the French and Germans (which from the very nature of its situation must have forced his descendants to be men of parts) was an effort of politics, the inventive work of a soldier, which the great people of the cabinet must not despise, and the rather since the bare apprehension of it threw Richelieu into inexpressible disquiet. But, not to tire my reader with more examples, I shall only observe, that Piccolomini, after growing grey in the service of thirty campaigns in Germany only, worn out with hardships, weakened by wounds, and approaching as may be imagined to a decline of life and parts, was yet considered, by the ministry at Vienna, as the only person capable of putting the peace of Münster into execution; by adjusting all the difficulties that might arise upon disbanding an immense army to whom war had been a trade, and plunder a subsistence; and to effect the evacuation and repossession of countries, cities, districts, signories, church-possessions, &c. almost beyond the power of calculation to specify; and yet all this was effected without any one momentous impediment, and, as far as I can remember, without bloodshed.

In a word, the fact is this: Trying times make great men, either in the field or in the closet; and though war takes the lead, negotiation is the child of it: For there must be trials of art as well as strength. And of this we have a clear proof, since greater generals were never beheld than in the course of the thirty years wars. Such for example were Mansfelt, Tilly, Gustavus Adolphus, Wallstein, Horn, Banier, Pappenheim, Mer-ci, Guébriant, Bernard duke of Saxe-Weymar, Torstenson, Condé, and Turenne. The ministers of state were equally famous, as Klefel, Dietricstein, Olivares, Oxenstiern, Richelieu, Camera-rius, Rusdorf, Salvius, and de Rache. For the general and the statesman are reciprocally formed to call forth each other; forasmuch as wherever there is war, there must be likewise negotiation.

The times we speak of had such a power to elicit what is called a genius, that the very ladies put in for their share of heroism and treaty-knowledge. The first and last ambassadress extraordinary and plenipotentiary was the wife of a general at this period.—The queen of Bohemia possessed herself the most of any person after the defeat at Prague: And when an offer was made her in the very ebb of her fortune (at a time when the unhappy exile subsisted upon charity, and had hardly a place to repose her head) that matters might then be composed, upon condition her eldest son was permitted to receive his education and religion at Vienna, with a promise of espousing one of the emperor's daughters: Her answer was, That she would sooner cut his throat with her own hands.—Elconora, queen of Sweden, left the pleasures of Stockholm to attend her husband in Germany, and marched to him at the head of a little army which she conducted to his relief. The electress of Brandenburg made a personal treaty with Gustavus at a time when her consort and all his Hoffraths could effect nothing.—And as to Amelia of Hanau, the landgraves of Hesse Cassel, no encomiums can do her justice. I own myself lost in astonishment, when I consider that unparalleled princess, who acted only for a minor, and consequently was circumscribed in power: Always Great, and almost always Fortunate; in the most critical situations of distress and pressure on every side!—As her life (on this side the water at least) may be considered as almost an anecdote, the public will hardly believe me when I say, she was her own prime-minister, her own secretary, and her own general: And, what is still more, her courage, her ability, her honesty went so hand in hand, that ill principles never tempted her to be unfaithful to her allies; and past ill conduct never called upon her to play a second game by way of self-preservation!—And though this account of her be only momentary and incidental, yet a few slight touches may serve to give the reader some idea of an heroine who is not to be met with in every page of a common history. In a word, she fulfilled that extraordinary character, worthy to be transcribed in letters of gold,

which was drawn by a cotemporary poet in her own neighbourhood ; for the incomparable Amelia was precisely, in a political and military sense ;

The generosity of kings and chief commanders in those days was very great. Gustavus, though far from being rich, never promoted a common soldier for his merit, but always gave him bountifully at the same time. Walstein seldom presented an officer of consequence with less than five hundred pounds. The cardinal Infant, after the battle of Nordlingen, settled a pension upon Gamba-corta, made him knight of St. Jago, and procured him a second annual salary from Madrid : He gave Piccolomini a fine diamond on the same occasion, and a commandery worth more than one thousand pounds per annum. Nor did he forget any single officer that behaved well. The emperor paid Verdugo near four thousand pounds, by way of ransom for the young prince of Anhalt, and allowed him for a crest to his arms, a right-hand supporting the Austrian eagle. Several rich signories in Lower Saxony were conferred on Tilly. Walstein was first gratified with the duchy of Sagan in Silesia, and afterwards with that of Mechlenberg, whose annual revenue is well known to be greatly considerable. Tilly bequeathed ten thousand pounds to the veteran Walloons ; and the great diamond the Infanta gave him (with money also) to found a chantry for the holy virgin of Oetinghen. The duke de Weymar devised about the same sum to his several colonels, and ordered a month's pay to be advanced to every soldier, which might make a donation which amounted to about twelve thousand pounds more.

Something remained in that age which resembled the old chivalry-taste of imprefe and devices. The little victory of Oyta informed the Imperialists that Mansfelt was a man of elegance as well as prowess; for his colours were all new, and of the richest materials; exquisitely blazoned, the emblems admirably chosen, and the mottos extremely pertinent. A regiment in those days valued itself as much upon its lemma as its colonel; (the motto being in truth the respective article of military belief and practice in that corps :) I once saw an illuminated collection of all the emblems and inscriptions that had been carried on standards during the thirty years wars; but it was only transiently, and without the power of making a drawing from them. What surprised me was, that those belonging to the Croats were the best imagined of any, which made me conclude at the time, that having little fancy and less learning, they purchased their designs of some man of parts, who gladly exchanged his classical learning against their plunder.

The romantic taste alike prevailed in the very names of their horses; for I have seen a list of some of the principal ones that belonged to Walstein and other generals; which were surnamed, Amaranto, Bellocchio, Focotesta, Inamorato, Bellpello, Stabene, Allegramente; as likewise Donna Biancha, Balarina, Donzella, Fanciulla, Vittoria, Fortuna, &c.

It was found out likewise in the course of these wars, that there was no hiring foreign troops to any considerable purpose, except the power that contracted for them sent a commissary-general of its own to pay them: Since to levy armies upon other principles was nothing more than profuse and useless squandering of public money; which after it had passed through the canal of a foreign prince, and the little aqueducts of a few court-favourites and general officers beneath him, underwent so many filtrations, that hardly a drop escaped for the consolation and support of the poor combating soldier: Nay this measure was thought so salutary and self-evident, that (except my

my memory deceives me greatly) it was practised under the ministry of James I.

As to contributions and military exactions, it was customary with a commanding officer to collect them according to his muster-roll; of which the consequence was, that he put that portion into his pocket which was claimed by virtue of non-effective men. This abuse ran so high in the Imperial army, that Tilly, for fear of disobliging the powers that were his master's friends, published a strong manifesto against it in the year 1627, denouncing nothing less to all delinquents than the forfeiture of their lives and fortunes; concluding with assuring them, that the infliction of this punishment was, and should be, indepre-cable.

An illustrious author* observes, that the contributions raised by generals, and the pillage extorted by soldiers, constituted at that time (namely just before the arrival of Gustavus) the principal military art among the Imperialists: That the two regiments of Pappenheim and St. Julian, quartered in the middle Marche, drained the country of sixty-two thousand pounds in sixteen months: And Walstein is said to have pillaged the whole electorate of Brandenburg to the amount of two millions sterling; but that calculation can hardly be admitted †.

The nature of the times was then such, that Aldringer and Merci (which latter I suppose to be the greatest general since the days of Gustavus) with numbers more whom I could easily mention, all rose to high commands merely by superiority of genius: For in a course of thirty years long and serious struggle, the favourites of princes and ministers, and the children and relations of people of quality (such excepted as had truly great abilities) were all supplanted, cashiered, or destroyed by the fate of war; on the other hand, merit obtruded itself, and forced the public to accept it: So that hardly can a general be found in these times who had not originally carried a musquet. Oxenfiern (though in that respect I think him blameable) had a mortal aversion to admit men of great rank and condition into high commands. Tilly and Walstein were gentlemen born, with little more than a titular patrimony; as were Dampier and Bucquoy. Mansfelt and another illustrious commander had nothing to feed themselves with but the point of their swords: John de Wert was a peasant; General Beck a shepherd; Stalhaus a serving-man; Aldringer a valet de chambre, an amanuensis, a velt-maréchal.

Gustavus had some generals who were no great masters of writing or reading; and it was partly for this reason, as I have hinted elsewhere, that most commanders of consequence kept a secretary. I have heard a pleasant anecdote upon this head, which may be worth relating; not that I intend to become surety for its authenticity: One evening, at a council of war, some intercepted letters were brought to the king; his Majesty (whose eye-sight was not the most perfect) ordered a venerable grey-headed general who stood by him to break them open and read them aloud. The officer shewed an inclination to obey, but lamented previously the loss of his spectacles. Read you, said the king hastily to another; but that great commander complained grievously of an inflammation in his eyes: Pish, said Gustavus, being a little provoked, my thoughts were absent upon other matters: And then reducing his countenance to a smile; General Banier, said he, pray read; you have been used to it *.

The military dress of those times was curious enough; for the heroes were a sort of fine gentlemen in their way. Ruffs were worn in all varieties, and frilled and tortured into every kind of shape: Nevertheless, the flat sort which reclined on the shoulder was preferred for convenience-sake upon most occasions;

* Banier was a nobleman of fashion, and had received an excellent education. His letters to the maréchal de Guebriant may be considered as masterpieces in war and politics.

but then we must except the practices of the Spanish commanders and Tilly : which latter followed the mode of Bruxelles, where he first grew acquainted with courts. Wigs were then hardly known : Most wore their own hair, cultivated inartificially enough, but cut short à la soldatesque : Pappenheim, Piccolomini, and even Oxenstiern, affected an high bold foretop, which had a martial air, for it seemed to stand half upright ; the rest smoothed down the front-part with a milder appearance ; and Christian duke of Brunswic, Bernard duke of Saxe-Weymar, Dewbatel, and John de Wert, spread the hair half down their foreheads, in the manner Vandyck's young men are painted. Whiskers were thought as necessary as swords ; I remember no picture unfurnished with them, excepting duke Christian's of Brunswic ; which prince was so very young that perhaps he arrived not to the happy hour of wearing the mustacho. But their distinguishing vanity made its appearance in a gold chain, which each officer of distinction wore round his neck, fastened behind with a loop and button. Some of these chains were garnished in such manner as to amount to a very great expence : Yet it is thought by many that affectation was not the pure motive of wearing them, since they served to secure the owner from the fury of the enemy, in case of being taken prisoner, and proved a sort of retaining fee, engaged for the payment of a future ransom. The colour of their military scarf was arbitrary, and so were the materials ; but nothing was spared in the magnificence and richness of the embroidery. Their swords were large and heavy, not extremely embellished ; their pistols of a length enormous ; the temper of metal in both incomparably perfect. Their boots were large, thick, and wrinkled, with high tops cut slant-wise, and prepared so as to resist a common pistol-ball, except it came in a particular direction. But the oddness of their spurs is scarce to be accounted for : It is thought they were made to jingle, in order to animate the horses and keep them up to their duty without goring their flanks unmercifully.

unmercifully. Many generals armed themselves cap-a-pie: Their breast-plates, helmets, and the junctures of their armour were often inlaid with gold and silver, richly diapered with the same materials; and some few (but this must be restrained to the Swedish service) wore only back and breast plates, with an upper-suit of perfumed leather, prepared and stiffened so as to be a covering of resistance.

His majesty himself wore nothing of the defensive nature, except an elf-skin waistcoat, which seems to me (notwithstanding the excuses alledged by him) to be matter of inclination and pure choice.

That we may judge better of the habiliment of warriors in the former part of the preceding century, history hath preserved us a curious portrait of the count de Tilly. He was a little man, and affected something of the Spaniard in his dress and manners, having received his first education at the court of the Infanta. Maréchal Grammont found him at the head of his army on a march, mounted on a small white Croatian pad, in a green fatten doublet with flashed sleeves, and trowsers of the same stuff; a little cocked hat, with a red ostrich plume in it, which reached down to his reins; and a belt round his waist of two inches breadth, to which hung his fighting sword, with a single pistol only in one of his holsters. This general, when the Frenchman paid his compliments to him, said, “ Sir, “ perhaps you may find my accoutrements somewhat extraor- “ dinary, and not wholly reconcileable to the mode of France; “ nevertheless, ’tis my humour, and that’s sufficient. I am “ persuaded likewise, that my little hackney and solitary pistol “ surprize you as much as my habit; but that you may not “ entertain an unfavourable opinion of the count de Tilly, to “ whom you have done the honour of paying a visit of curiosity, “ permit me to inform you, that I have gained seven decisive “ battles, without being obliged to discharge the pistol now “ under consideration; nor hath the little pad in question ever “ failed “ failed me, or hesitated in performing his duty.” In a word, faith Grammont, he had the look of the old duke d’Alva, furnamed Castigador de Flamencos.

Duels were not extremely fashionable in those days, we hardly find half a dozen in the space of thirty years continued war ; every hour affording better proofs for valour, than such irrational and ferocious appeals to public opinion. Nor were superior commanders ill thought of by their adherents and followers in case they refused to refer themselves to such sort of decisions. Cratz, in the transports of resentment, challenged Walstein when he was generalissimo and absolute ; yet nothing resulted from the provocation ; it was passed by with neglect. John de Wert killed Merodé, but the affair was purely a rencounter. Young Pappenheim, ’tis true, lost his life in a real duel, but that happened merely because he had eluded the vigilance of his general, who had locked the city-gates, and planted spies to watch the motions of the combatants. Aldringer never forgave Sirot for drawing his sword in his presence, though he himself set the example, and insisted upon making his life the forfeiture for the offence. Greater cautions were still taken in the Swedish service : Count de Souches challenged general Stalhaus, but first resigned his commission. Duels before this time had been severely prohibited in France, and the French king declared, with an oath, that he would reward such military persons as had spirit enough to refuse a challenge. By Gustavus’s laws all private quarrels were decided by the officers of the regiment, and all challenges referred to a court-martial ; and, if an inferior officer allowed the common soldiers to engage hand to hand, he was to be cashiered ipso facto, and serve as a private man, being answerable also for all the mischief that should be committed in such engagements. The singularly best swordsman in the course of these wars was the count de Forgatz, yet we find nothing remarkable concerning him in the public field of action. As to the custom of seconds, I think it appeared as early as the year 1570.

Judicial astrology was the reigning passion of that age: Nothing great was undertaken without consulting the volume of the stars. Tycho Brahe, Grebner, Braunborn, Herlicius, Baptista Seni, &c. were all revered, as far as men could reverence them, on this side of idolatry. Princes dreaded them, respected them, and see'd them. The predicting sages were of both religions; and each of them read the book of the heavens his own way. In the regions of the north Gustavus was the Arctic Lion, the vis vivida of the reformation, and the new luminary in Cassiopæa: Again, in the dominions of the south, he was another Alaric and Attila, the scourge of God, and the genuine Antichrist.

Much enlightened was the potentate esteemed who had the happiness to retain in his service one or more well-instructed astrologers: For the explanation of an horoscope half determined Frederic to accept the crown of Bohemia, and partly induced the emperor to depose Wallstein; who, on the other hand, that he might keep pace with his master in point of intelligence, allowed his philosopher an extraordinary equipage and pension magnificent enough to be called royal. When Herlicius died, the princes and generals in Germany became quite bewildered; but Gustavus saw through these weaknesses, and considered them as alike impious and infructuous. France in this respect was as little illuminated as the empire: The grave history of De Thou, and the sage memoirs of Sully, breathe much of these doctrines. Louis XIII. was surnamed The Just, because born under Libra: And Anne of Austria had a mathematician concealed in her closet, in order to calculate the fortune of Louis XIV. with uncommon accuracy. William Lilly, in England, did Cromwell more service than a regiment of cuirassiers. He even received a medal of compliment from Gustavus: But the king was then extremely young. Nay, it was with great obstinacy and reluctance that the science expired even in our island; for, amongst many others, Dryden himself (who lived to see the commencement of this century) relied partly thereon, and understood horoscopes and astral culminations with no contemptible exactness. The taste for prodigies was likewise very strong in the times of Gustavus; even Chemnitius treats them with great deference, the best-instructed and most sensible historian of that period; for he was supposed to compose his works, or a part thereof at least, on the memoirs of Oxenstiern. Boys born with boots and spurs, showers and rivers of blood, black rainbows, pitched battles in the air, and a thousand such other credenda * were supposed to happen every year. The king of Denmark concluded the peace of Lubec in consequence of a flash of lightning. Not that I take upon me to deny but that the Supreme Being, in such extraordinary times, may give uncommon indications of his displeasure, and that many circumstances related, were or might be preternatural; yet, as they cannot be precisely distinguished at this distance, I have thought fit to pass them all by, except one or two that fell necessarily in my track, and bore some reference to the tenor of the history.

Predictions had their weight too. The arrival of Gustavus in the empire was no secret to the Illuminati many years before it happened. Tycho Brahe foretold, with reference to the new star that appeared in Cassiopæa 1572, that a prince should arise in the north, from whom much happiness should be expected by those who made profession of the evangelical religion; and this prediction was made public twenty years before Gustavus entered Germany.

Amongst other examples of this kind, Pappenheim boasted, (or others more probably in his behalf) that, conformably to a prophecy recorded in the archives of his family, a certain Pappenheim Balafré *, mounted on a white steed, should kill a king of Sweden hand to hand. And historians have thought themselves so much obliged to give authenticity to the completion of this event, that one third of them introduce him some hours sooner than he really arrived at the battle of Lützen, merely for the sake of fulfilling the prediction.

Omens and dreams were studied, explained, and believed with great attention and respect. The fall of a triumphal column was one of the arguments the Austrian ministers used to persuade their master to depose Wallstein. A visible damp spread itself through the Imperial army, because the council of war preceding the battle of Leipzig chanced to be held at a gravedigger's house; garnished then, and if I mistake not till this moment, with an Arabesque fresco of shank-bones crossed, skulls, and hour-glasses. The lesson for the Sunday || preceding the battle of Prague, Mat. vi. 22. Render to Cesar the things that are Cesar's, broke the spirit of the Palatin-party all at once, forasmuch as Cesar is the German and Bohemian word for Emperor. On the other hand, the Swedes gained a part of their victory at Leipzig by the interposition of a ring-dove, and a part by virtue of a dream which Gustavus had the preceding night; of which the substance was, that in a struggle with Tilly he never quitted the hold he had in his hair, but received a bite from him in his left side: Which Frederic Spanheim, one of the most sensible and exact writers of that period, interprets thus: That Gustavus should keep the field of battle, and obtain the advantage; but that the Saxons, in the left wing of the army, should retire with infamy.

Many military men believed that their armour and bodies might be rendered impenetrable by enchantment. When a person was sublimated to this pitch of invulnerability, he was pronounced, with great elegance of speech, to be gefrorn †, and it is thought the Italian astrologers who attended the army, held this secret in conjunction with their ostensible profession. Tilly himself was supposed, by the common Swedes, to have tampered with these sorts of practices. An honest Englishman tells us, that the town-surgeon of Halle having dressed his wounds after the battle of Leipzig, and discovering nothing but horrible contusions (a thing not uncommon in wounds received under the best-tempered suit of armour that could then probably be made) pronounced his body to be gefrorn. But, saith my countryman, very loth I am to leave so base an imputation on such an honourable commander. Nevertheless, Perusi was supposed by the multitude to have been rendered invulnerable beyond dispute, as was also the Austrian shoemaker *, [who succeeded one Fadinger an hatter, and conducted a rebellion, at the head of 60,000 rustics :] since the stroke of a cannon-ball, saith a grave and serious historian †, made him recoil seven paces without killing him, till at length a colonel of Pappen-

* This extraordinary phenomenon made his appearance in the European hemisphere, Anno 1626. His predecessor had sent an embassy to Ferdinand II. consisting of one nobleman's steward, two tradesmen, and three farmers. He himself, on assuming the reins of authority, (and this may shew how finely Shakespear painted human nature in the character of Cade on a like occasion) published something between an edict and manifesto, which ran precisely thus :

“ We Achaz Willenger, elected, upon the death of Stephen Fadinger, supreme commander of the three evangelical armies in Upper Austria, send greeting to all colonels, lieutenant-colonels, captains, &c. acting under our authority : Whereas several ships, filled with soldiers and military stores, have been conveyed by the duke of Bavaria to our capital enemy Adam, who calls himself count Herberdorff, and governor of Lintz, and that more supplies of the same kind (whereof We have certain knowledge) are daily expected, to the entire destruction of the Protestant religion, except some remedy be administered thereunto ; determine, in

“ our great wisdom, to assault the town of Lintz with redoubled violence, and reduce the pretended governor to reason by fire and sword.

“ Wherefore, in order to overcome a commander so artful and designing as this our adversary is, in a case where force and numbers may happen to miscarry, it seemeth highly expedient that you recommend to us men of distinguished capacity and experience, men who love their country, and have a sincere zeal for the liberties and salvation of their fellow-christians.

“ We also convey the same instructions in military matters to all the officers serving under us in our several armies, and request them to send us such select and approved combatants as shall be found, upon enquiry, among their troops ; it being highly reasonable, that all should exert themselves in an emergency, where all (if unsuccessful) are equally liable to the same irreversible sentence of destruction.” [Laurea Austriaca.]

heim's put an end to his life by a pistol-shot. And here is it not amazing, that the same author should recite these two stories, and believe them both? Be that as it will, this doctrine in general was chiefly believed by the common sort of people; and so far it was a real object of public notice; for the first article of Gustavus's discipline is directed against enchanting the human body, so as to render it invulnerable; as also against enchanted armour and swords: All delinquents to be prohibited from conversing with their fellow-soldiers, and to be strictly punished according to the laws of the land, and those of scripture. Yet so strong then was the power of delusion that the Maréchal de Grammont tells us, that being taken prisoner by a German officer at the siege of Mantua, and carried to that commander's tent in a sort of deliquium, occasioned by the loss of blood; the said officer being as much wounded as himself; an Imperial colonel requested his friend (there being no surgeons in the army) that he might pronounce a few words of mystical importance over him. Immediately the orifice of the wound closed, though it had poured out blood in a full stream. The enchanter then begged leave to perform the same kind office to Grammont; but, says the latter, my answer was, "That, as I trusted in God, I would hold no correspondence with the devil; and, if I was to die, my exit should be such as truly became the man of honour." From whence it is plain that Grammont believed the fact.

Nay, farther, with respect to incantations, whilst the life and actions of Gustavus have long lain forgotten, Dissertations* have been published on his very sword, which, from the extensive nature of his conquests, was supposed to be magical. Fresh debates have likewise arisen from the same subject; as whether, for example, the sword he used at the battle of

We may extend our remarks by observing, that as the soldiers, at least in the Imperial service, were generally ill-clothed, and not over careful in point of cleanliness, being obliged to content themselves sometimes with the worst of diet; pestilential and petechial fevers raged abundantly; and the latter are still very rife among those nations who supply the Austrian army with irregulars; as I observed myself in the year 1749, when I passed a summer on the confines of Croatia.

The famine, during the greater part of these wars, kept pace with the pestilence. Wheat was sold, more times than once, for three pounds eighteen shillings a bushel*. Guards were posted to protect the newly-buried from being devoured. There were instances of children being seduced, massacred, and eaten up. Two women fought for a slice of a dead horse, and one killed the other. A straggling beggar decoyed away a poor woman's child, and began to strangle it, in order to eat it; but the vigilant mother surprized her in the fact, and killed her ‡. The face of the earth was ruined for want of agriculture, and every animal eatable was so greedily searched after, that the beasts of prey missed their daily food. When Lord Arundel passed thro' the empire, in return from his embassy to Vienna, a fox crept out of a brake, and seized one of his attendants by the leg: The fellow took it up, for it was so weak it could not escape; its eyes were haggard, and sunk in its head, and it weighed just nothing. And, if I remember right, there was another remark in the same relation, namely, that almost every house contained nothing but a famished dog.

But by this time it may be highly proper to draw a veil over the more melancholy productions of a raging and long-subsisting war; for though its subsequent effects may be contemplated as the re-establishment of peace, order, religion, and property throughout all Europe, more or less; yet the sufferings of those poor wretches, to whom Providence then gave their period of existence, must be ever considered, by an humane and compassionate man, as a very sharp and severe trial: And, of course, one may safely infer with Gustavus (for the remark is as just as if it had proceeded from a professorial chair) that be the advantages of war as great as it is possible to imagine, yet that war itself is an evil, permitted by Providence,

Gustavus Adolphus.

IF a personal valour of the clearest and most distinguishing fort ; if a firmness of mind rendered more intuitive and operative by the approach of dangers, and difficulties ; if a capacity in politics equal, to say the least of it, to that of the greatest prime minister whom Europe hath ever seen ; if an abhorrence of dissimulation and subterfuge ; if a generous, open, and undissembled spirit of resenting national injuries ; if a perfective and inventive genius in all the branches of military knowlege ; if generosity and humanity, moderation and courtesy, public and domestic affection, and above all, a sincere and vital sense of religion and piety, are sufficient outlines to give force and character to the portrait of a true hero ; (allowances being ever to be made for the frailties and errors incidental to meer human nature ;) it seems to be highly probable, that the reader will not be dissatisfied with the delineation I propose to make of the life and actions of the Great Gustavus *; and if, more or less, in all, or various instances, it is my misfortune to write beneath the truth, and even below my own ideas, yet thence it can never follow with strict justice that the original object is devoid of lustre; but that it shines on a body made up of broken and unequal surfaces, neither capable to receive the brightness itself, nor transmit it to others.

The hero of my present history, born December 9, 1594, was grandson of Gustavus Ericson, (whose family name was Vasa †) the great deliverer of Sweden. And here a writer more superstitious than myself, might be inclined to think, that there was something in the name of Gustavus con-natural to the prosperity of that kingdom, whenever he considers the reigns and illustrious actions of these two renowned princes; so that the northern wits are not to be looked upon as determined triflers by profession, when they anagrammatized the letters which form the word GUSTAVUS into the name of AUGUSTUS.

It is well known to the generality of readers, that the grandfather of Gustavus Adolphus, had been deputed by Sweden as one of the six hostages of state to Christian II. king of Denmark: a prince equally faithless and despotic; who in contradiction to his own royal promise, removed them all into his own country, and confined them there as prisoners of war. Thence, Gustavus Ericson, having obtained permission to amuse himself with a morning's hunting, contrived means to escape in disguise, and after various dangers, (making his first retreat to Lubeck) reached his native soil in the year 1520: at which the tyrant Christian conceived such extraordinary offence, that contrary to his express promise of an universal amnesty, (sworn by him four days after his Swedish coronation) he made the city of Stockholm an ocean of blood, sparing neither bishops, nor nobles, (amongst which the father of Gustavus Ericson was one) nor magistracy, nor gentry: and denying them likewise the common rights of religious sepulture. Upon which Ericson, transported with the warmth of a true patriot, collected some few companies of armed men during the winter season, and making fresh and fresh efforts of vigour as his party increased, arrived in the year 1523 to the honour of being elected king by the states of the country; but with a modesty and magnanimity almost peculiar to himself, he refused the form of coronation, and consented only to be called the governor of the kingdom. Vested with this authority, he convened the several orders of state, having chiefly in his eyes the great work of religious reformation; but untoward and unsurmountable obstacles presenting themselves, he resigned his title, and left the nation in the state he found it; nevertheless, the orders of Sweden at length persuaded him to accept the kingship in good earnest, and in 1528 he passed through a coronation in form; being the first protestant prince that the world had ever seen adorned with the regal diadem.

This great deliverer of his country died in the year 1560, having reigned more than one half of his life; and it was his rare felicity to govern with prudence and virtue, what he had conquered by industry and magnanimity; he left behind him three sons*: Eric the eldest, who succeeded his father in 1560, and having reigned eight years died without issue. John the second, who replaced his brother in 1568, and enjoyed the throne four and twenty years; and Charles duke of Sudermania, the father of the great Gustavus Adolphus.

But here it must be remembered, that on the death of John, the second son of Gustavus Ericson, in the year 1592, Sigismund, John's elder offspring †, who had been elected king of Poland seven years before, was admitted on certain conditions to ascend the throne of Sweden, of which the principal were (being all confirmed by solemn oath) That no strangers should be introduced into the kingdom; and that the confession of Augsburg should be the sole model of religion;—but as this prince palpably violated more or less all his engagements, and strove to make Sweden a province to Poland, he was rejected and deposed by the states in full assembly, anno 1599, and his son Vladisläus, then an infant, appointed bona fide to succeed him, with this strict proviso, That in six months he should be removed to Stockholm, and there educated in the religion of Luther. But the conditions mentioned being never realized, Charles duke of Sudermania, the father of Gustavus Adolphus, was considered by all the orders of state as the man marked out by providence for the preserver of their civil and christian liberties; and of course they disqualified young Vladisläus, and elected him their king in the year 1601: Gustavus being at this period but six years old.

We shall mention but few particulars with relation to Charles IX. (for so that prince was surnamed) excepting only such passages as bear a reference more or less to our youthful hero: concerning whom, in 1609. the year 1609 (a circumstance if we mistake not unnoticed hitherto by the English historians) he dispatched two ambassadors to the court of London * with instructions, amongst other matters of negotiation, to propose a marriage between his son Gustavus, who had then attained his fifteenth year, and the princess Elizabeth; who to her great misfortune, both in point of glory and happiness, was unluckily pre-engaged to the elector Palatin; a young heroine formed by nature to be a consort worthy of Gustavus Adolphus: for she was intrepid beyond her sex, and remained mistress of herself under all the pressures of poverty and exile. Yet providence supplied her place with a second heroine, inasmuch as Eleonora princess of Brandenburg appeared equal to Elizabeth in greatness of soul, and attained likewise a much happier and more fortunate destination.

1610. Gustavus from a child gave great marks of a military genius: and indeed he possessed so many shining good qualities from the indulgence of nature, that his father was tempted to bestow the finishing strokes on his education, in every possible respect. So that besides the tour he made through Germany incognito (of which we shall speak in the proper place) there is some reason to conclude he travelled between the age of childhood and puberty †, but of this one can pronounce nothing with any tolerable degree of certainty. Sure, however, and certain it is, 1610. that he talked Latin as a maternal tongue, with uncommon energy and precision; and was rendered master of mathematics and tactics in the very early parts of life. As to the French, Italian, and German languages, it is well known he spoke them fluently; and with respect to English (the only remaining language of reputation, wherein we can discover him to be deficient) he had so many officers of Great Britain who bore commissions under him, that he never could be puzzled for want of interpreters in any negotiations with that kingdom.

As to his manner of living, he was taught to feed wholesomely, but not luxuriously; and enured to hardships from the first beginnings of his infancy. Heats and colds were rendered indifferent to him; and he learned the duties of a common musqueteer, before he had strength to carry a musquet. And thus was Bucquoy, Tilly, Piccolomini, Merci, Montecuculi, and all the greatest generals formed in that century; and perhaps Turenne was one of the last who passed through this school of gradual probation.

In a word, it may be fairly said of Gustavus Adolphus, and as properly here as in any other place, That he was the first prince who taught the public, that there was a region buried in the depths of northern snows and ice, named Sweden; and a race of men in the world called Swedes, who had something to say to the grand continent of Europe: of which we shall hereafter exhibit various proofs, not merely with reference to Poland and Muscovy, but regions and kingdoms far more important; since (without mentioning the terror, admiration, and jealousy excited by him in the courts of Madrid and Versailles particularly) at, or near the death of that prince, and many years before the conclusion of the peace of Munster, the Swedes possessed 132 strong towns and fortresses in the Germanic empire; so that it was possible to sleep in one of them every night from the lake of Constance to the Baltic ocean. Yet they were obliged at last to sacrifice all these great acquisitions for half Pomerania, Wismar, the archbishopric of Bremen and Verden, and some other trifles*.

1611. Prince Gustavus in the seventeenth year of his age made a campaign against the Danes, being appointed by his father a colonel of cavalry. His first expedition (and therein he had the command in chief) was to secure Blechingen, and storm the important town of Christianopol, which the young hero effected sword in hand, having burst open a gate by the application of a petard; nevertheless, in approaching the city with over-great impetuosity, for a letter of the governor's being intercepted, wherein requisition was made of a reinforcement of 500 cavalry, he was obliged to use all possible expedition in order to prevent discovery, having clothed the same number of Swedish soldiers in the Danish uniform, and advancing under Danish ensigns; when lo! all in an instant it was his misfortune to sink into a morass covered with ice, but not sufficiently frozen, yet in that situation he still combated against his enemies, whilst his horse lay beneath him almost suffocated, contending and struggling with mire and water; at length one of the Baniers brought him off at the head of his company of cavalry, and received for this generous assistance the order of senator. Yet the person here mentioned was not the Banier who made so great a figure afterwards in the thirty years wars; that officer being junior to Gustavus. Towards the conclusion of the same campaign, the young prince at the head of 2000 musqueteers made a descent secretly at night into a little nameless island, and cut to pieces a considerable body of Danish troops who had there encamped themselves.

As to this war with Denmark, it is well known to all the world, that there had long subsisted a sort of hereditary jealousy and animosity between the Danes and the Swedes: for the latter began to grow formidable in more respects than one, ever since Gustavus Ericson had changed not only the religion, but the warlike and commercial notions of Sweden. Upon which his Danish majesty Christian IV, displeas'd and mortified to contemplate the figure which his neighbours began to make in the system of the North, and exasperated likewise to find his subjects prohibited from trading with Riga, Courland and Prussia, and their ships subjected to the capture of the Swedes, of course dispatched a herald to Stockholm, and declared peremptorily a fresh war in all the solemn ceremonies conformable to the practices of that age. 1611.

Charles IX. finding himself engaged against the Poles and the Muscovites, had certain prudential reasons for preferring a peace, and made various plausible advances towards an accommodation, which was to be managed by the states of the respective kingdoms, or by the intervention and mediation of neighbours and allies; but Christian had a secret inclination to embroil matters right or wrong, and of course opened the campaign by laying siege to Calmar and Elfsburg. Charles enraged at such an instance of irreconcilable obstinacy, and being incommoded heartily with Danish wars from time to time, conceived a whimsical thought, correspondent with the humour of the age, of sending a challenge to this troublesome and intermeddling adversary, proposing to decide the fate of the field in the compendious manner of single combat. Christian treated the proposal as it seems to have justly merited, and in a very polite manner told him, that such an enthusiastic scheme favoured more of the knight-errant, than of the monarch: and that it was an inconsiderable object of glory for a middle aged man to extinguish an old one, whom nature would take care to remove out of the way very soon. For Charles was then extremely infirm, having had a stroke of an hemiplegia about two years before; which put an end to his life some few weeks after he had sent this letter of defiance to his antagonist. At first sight the behaviour related of his Danish majesty carries with it the appearance of greatness of mind, and perhaps the answer was truly heroical; yet the Swedish nation formed other conclusions with respect to Christian's magnanimity. Be that as it will, it is at this distance impossible to pronounce upon what grounds he declined the combat: whether from timidity or generosity of spirit; or whether he considered a decision by duel as a temerarious and illicit action; or as matter of chivalry unbecoming the dignity of crowned heads. Yet thus much is certain and incontestable, that the gallantry of the proposal touched and hurt him at the very moments he made it the subject of ridicule and raillery; for he attacked the Swedish camp (where the king then lay) some few days afterwards, not without inconsiderable 1617. considerable disadvantage to the party assailed. Upon the death of Charles he still conceived more sanguine expectations, for it was thought a long interregnum might prove very prejudicial to the affairs of Sweden; and rather as the kingdom at that juncture was involved in a disagreeable war, not only against Denmark, but with Poland and Muscovy likewise.

And here we may just observe in passing along, that it was the lot of Charles, Gustavus's father, to be more concerned with proposals of duels than had happened to any personage of his rank in that age. For about eleven years before an angry acrimonious letter had been sent to him by Zamoski first general to Sigismund king of Poland (a spirited old man, who was then high chancellor of the republic) to which Charles returned this short billet, the Latin language being the vehicle through which he conveyed his sentiments; Non es mihi par; si par esses, non armis te, sed fuste depexum & unctum darem. To which Zamoski replied in a style more extraordinary, as it passed from a Polish nobleman to a person of Charles's rank and elevation; Audiebam te hominem cerebrosum &c.— Si non sint in Polonia, per Dei gratiam proditores; in aula vestra querendi sunt. Quicquid in me contumeliosum scripseris aut dixeris, prorsus te MENTIRI dico, & dicam & scribam.— Jam desino.

Nevertheless Charles, no unworthy author of existence to the great Gustavus, was brave in war, faithful in alliances, and sincere to his friends; prompt to remunerate, instantaneous in punishment; for it was observed of him, even to a proverbial expression, that the thunderbolt always succeeded the flash of lightning. True it is, that his temper took fire upon some occasions to an eminent degree, (and a part of this infirmity Gustavus received transmissively from him) but the torrent soon subsided and grew calm, if nothing opposed it: and even in the transports of impetuosity there appeared ever an opening for new informations, or submissive acknowledgments. No king ever hated popery with more firmness, or upon better principles; and as to his plain good sense, solidity and sagacity, let those presages be a proof which he uniformly conceived from the young Gustavus; for whenever the chiefs of the ministry and himself were puzzled upon any foreign or domestic difficulties, culties, it was his custom to call the child to him (who chose always to play in the father's apartment) and laying his hand tenderly on his head, *There gentlemen, said he, this is the person who must unravel the intricacy, or repel the danger; ille faciet.

Charles likewise gave Gustavus an example of cultivating the arts of peace and war with equal application; for he took care to see justice speedily and impartially administered; he exhibited annual pensions to thirty students, and levied all taxes with caution and delicacy; he applied himself assiduously to agriculture, mines, and commerce: in which latter instance he shewed so peculiar a fondness, that it was his invariable custom to go aboard all foreign ships on the summer-evenings, and if the captain imported corn, salt, and such like useful merchandizes, "Friend, said he, you shall lade back with good exchangeable commodities of iron and copper;" but if the master of the vessel brought matters of luxury and superfluity, he used to say aloud to his attendants, "Take care that this man be re freighted with Swedish turnips †, and "nothing else."

This illustrious prince arrived to the age of sixty-one. It was told him on his death-bed ‡ that general De la Gardiz || had obtained great successes in the Russian war, and settled various preliminaries concerning the advancement of his younger son Charles Philip to the station of Czar: to which he replied with an air of composure, That he resigned all worldly cares into better hands, § casting an affectionate and earnest look upon our Gustavus. He married two wives, Anna Maria daughter of Louis elector Palatin, who bore him two sons and four daughters, who all died before they arrived to years of maturity, except the princess Catharina, who espoused the count Palatin of the Rhine, and gave to the 1611. world Charles Louis, crowned afterwards king of Sweden under the title of Charles X. By his second wife Christina, daughter of Adolphus duke of Holstein and Sleswic, he had Gustavus Adolphus and Charles Philip lately mentioned, which latter prince was born in the year 1600, and died at Narva, January 25, 1622; as likewise Maria Elizabeth, who married John duke of Ostrogothia; and by an illicit amour Charles Carolson count de Gildenheim, high admiral of the Swedish fleet when his half brother entered Germany.

Immediately on the death of Charles IX. all persons made manifest a pre-disposition in favour of Gustavus; and at the expiration of two months the queen dowager and John duke of Ostrogothia, who (with Oxenstiern and several senators) were the young prince's guardians, convened an assembly of the states at Nicoping, where the right of succession was first discussed, and ways and means afterwards considered whereby to propose a peace or truce with the Danes, Polanders, and Muscovites, or continue the war with success and vigour. Under the first head some few difficulties arose of no great moment, and at length it was resolved unanimously to remain by the hereditary disposition which had been agreed upon at Norcopen in 1594: and with regard to an eventual war, which most people foresaw and expected, it was determined to support the young prince with reputation and spirit, and infuse new activity into the cultivation of the mines, agriculture and commerce. Mean while it was thought expedient that duke John should resign all pretensions to the throne of Sweden, being half brother to Sigismund king of Poland, and first cousin to Gustavus; but more nearly related to the throne by laws of consanguinity, inasmuch as he was the son of Gustavus's father's elder brother; of course the kinsman generously added a part of Westergothia to his former appennage of Ostrogothia. On the other hand the dowager queen Christina made a plenary resignation of her regency, partly as her son had attained the age prescribed by law*, and partly as they discovered talents and capacity in him as made him in effect a person of mature years and discretion *. And here it may be matter of real astonishment, why a youth of parts and courage, circumstanced like prince John, who had arrived to due and lawful age conformably to the regulations of the Swedish constitution, himself a soldier and not disliked by the army, should freely and voluntarily without a sigh or a murmur resign a throne, to which his pretensions were not only justifiable, but strictly legal! It is true the succession had been settled (when John was a minor) upon Gustavus, but that was no argument to a prince of spirit and magnanimity, inasmuch as the same people had once settled the like political entail upon him †; and with respect to age and experience according to the common course of things he had the advantage over his cousin by five years, being at this very period twenty-two. Yet John, to the amazement of us at present, and all Europe in those days, neither advanced his claims, nor retired from court, nor formed cabals and factions there, or in the country where he had great property, but on the contrary bore a command under his kinsman, and served him in war and peace faithfully, cordially and vigorously to his dying moments: and yet this prince was not devoid of ambition, as appears by the figure he chose to make at the head of an army.

Now whether it was, that Gustavus was so adored by the people that nothing could give a man the chance of setting aside the decrees of senate, or whether John had the same prepossessions with the Swedish nation in his behalf, discovering abilities in him which made him alone worthy to conduct the affairs of Sweden at that juncture, are matters we cannot presume to discuss distinctly at this distance from the fact itself. That he should act likewise in perpetual contravention of his brother Sigismund's measures (descended indeed from another mother) appears to be a sort of conduct that carries with it an air of particularity; nevertheless it may be resolved into his sincere and vital zeal for the Lutheran religion. Yet Sigismund was still more nearly related to him than Gusta-

1611. vus, nor did he want for solicitations, promises and temptations, as his Polish brother bore a determined hatred to the young king of Sweden.

In a word, John was either a prince of heroic gallantry, who preferred that system (to his own prejudice) which appeared best for his country; or else dreaded to dispute a succession with one in whom he discovered abilities of all kinds far superior to his own. But sometimes great events are directed by private and scarce-perceptible motives; and perhaps the passion he bore for Gustavus's sister, whom he married the year ensuing, made him naturally esteem the brother of his beloved object, whom a war concerning the succession might have ravished from his arms for ever. And it is probable from the great expediency of this union to the affairs of Gustavus, that the queen dowager talked in so high a strain of authority and firmness to the Swedish clergy when they made attempts to propose difficulties concerning the marriage.

In a word, this act of John's, considered in whatever light we please, carries with it a fine spirit of heroical magnificence; for the same senators that settled the succession upon Gustavus had fixed it upon him some few years before. Yet he made a voluntary and cheerful resignation of all pretensions (except Gustavus died without male or female issue) to his own immortal honour, and the perpetual advantage of Sweden. By all I can learn, he had no descendants.

Yet notwithstanding all these favourable prepossessions and concessions, Gustavus comported himself with great moderation, and assured the senators in a public speech, that his youth and inexperience on the one hand, and the great emergency of affairs on the other hand, made him wish to decline such a perillous pre-eminence; nevertheless, continued he, if the states persist to make me a king, I will endeavour to acquit myself with honour, magnanimity, and fidelity. And then before he was inaugurated, he delivered to the orders of state what the Swedes call a paper of asservation, whereby he declared to preserve the reformed religion till the last moments of his life; to maintain the rights of senator and subject; and respect his mother and relations with all that tenderness which consanguinity is supposed to dictate.—Engaging and stipulating at the same time, to make no in-war, truces, treaties or general taxes, except with the full and free consent of the states assembled.—That he would preserve the received and established formulary of church-ordination; protect and encourage the university of Upsal, and the state of learning in general, (of which he gave strong proofs that very year;) that he would reform all common abuses in the courts of judicature; and not only declare the names of state informers, if properly requested, but punish them (whenever in the course of trial they appeared guilty) correspondently to the requisition of the persons aggrieved and injured.

These great concessions conveyed in effect much more power to the Swedish nation than it could presume to ask; but a prince like Gustavus, who determined always to act honestly and magnificently, preferred rather to depend on the generosity and gratitude of the people, than on his own authority and political artifice: in consequence of this declaration, signed at Nicoping December 31, 1611, he received the sacred communion, and passed through the inaugurating ceremony.

At the opening of the year 1612 the new-designated king summoned 1612, a public convention of the states, where the methods of administering the government at that juncture were first considered, as likewise ways and means whereby to establish a peremptory truce or denounce an explicit war against Poland; a resumption being next made of all crown grants, which was confirmed afterwards by regal sanction. He then published a memorial (this was towards the conclusion of the year) setting forth the uncertain returns of tythes * and feudal lands: and that an account of the annual income arising from them should be delivered every twelve months into the royal exchequer; and lastly, that all grants which his majesty proposed not to resume, should receive from his hand a new confirmation before the conclusion of half a year.

It is certain that the situation of Gustavus was truly critical. Is it not amazing that a youth who had but then turned the seventeenth year of his age, should be able to confront on the one hand an indefatigable pretender to his throne and dominions, like the king of Poland,

* The tythes in Sweden make a considerable part of the crown-revenue,

But the character of Gustavus was an unshaken firmness *, and by his spirit he kept all his nobles in profound subjection, though at first, till they knew him better, they secretly repined to see a grandson of a subject raised to a throne, and that throne appropriated to the family of Vasa. Having thus made mankind acquainted with his steadiness, he gave the world a new opening into his character as a prince of uncommon judgment and sagacity by one of the first steps he took after his inauguration ; for he filled all the public posts civil and military with persons of the most distinguished merit in their respective departments, and placed Oxenstiern at the head of domestic and foreign affairs ; one of the ablest statesmen perhaps that ever appeared in the political world. This was one of those masterly strokes that determine the character of a man's life : and yet the idea was conceived by Gustavus about the eighteenth year of his age ; so that Oxenstiern being then but twenty-eight or twenty-nine †, the disproportion appears not so very extraordinary betwixt the sovereign and the minister.

Oxenstiern was a statesman whom posterity considers in the character of a man that hath never been rivalled ! and yet it is more than probable that Gustavus was at least his equal in political science. Not that hereby I would manifest any inclination to depreciate the merit of the great and illustrious rix-chancellor, whom I regard as highly as man can do on this side of that partiality which borders upon implicit veneration. He had fame enough from his own fund, to stand in need of borrowing from no other man's. Nevertheless it is my duty to do all possible justice to Gustavus, since this single circumstance will deliver him down to posterity adorned with a double portion of ability and glory.

But these things as they may, the king had still great demands for the assistance of Oxenstiern : and in truth, he had so much business upon his hands, whether as a warrior or as a statesman, that it was necessary to admit a partner in the fatigues and honour both of government and war. And thus a king, of a cast peculiar to himself, supported by such a fellow-labourer in a life alike military and civil, produced such a rapid and uninterrupted series of great events, as neither ancient nor modern history can parallel, if all difficulties and obstructions come to be considered attentively and effectually, and not partially and superficially. And lastly it must be observed, that the person assumed into participation of employments with Gustavus was not only a politician of the first class, but no inconsiderable general besides. Nor must the reader blame me for bestowing my encomiums so profusely on Oxenstiern, when at the same time we assure him that Urban VIII, one of the most clear-sighted and sensible personages then in Europe, always considered the chancellor as a being of some superior order.

Soon after the interval between the death of Charles IX. and the accession of Gustavus, the pacificator general of Europe dispatched Sir James Spence on an embassy into Sweden ; exhorting the young prince to make manifest the same inclinations towards peace which his father had always discovered *. Gustavus received the interposition of his Britannic majesty with an air of frankness and cheerfulness, as likewise the kind interference of the states general : for by the way England and Holland wished much to see the navigation of the Baltic free and undisturbed. Of course a congress was appointed, where much disquisition passed between the chancellors of Sweden and Denmark, who sustained the two principal characters in the debate. But though it might be matter of conscience in a German historian to recite religiously every circumstance in the whole transaction, (of which the objections and solutions, the tergiversations and over-reachings, the suspicions of a king's good faith passed in days of minority, the punctilious ceremonies and chicaneries were alike endless and insignificant :) yet it may suffice for us to leave

For the king their master had always a firm persuasion, grounded on the supposed innate powers of his learning and argumentation, (in this instance no ways to be deemed unsuccessful) that the rage and resentment of two contending nations were as easily composed, (and that by a very slight interposition) as the altercations and combats of bees;

Nevertheless, we fancy his Britannic majesty hung a little upon the above-mentioned ceremonial difficulties, for a sensible foreigner assures us *, that he was very punctilious in matters of form and precedency, refusing to stand godfather to madame Elizabeth of France, in conjunction with the infanta Clara Eugenia, daughter and sister to a king of Spain, and sovereign of the Low Countries. And yet Anne, mother of Louis XIV, condescended to appear at the font with cardinal Richelieu, who was her subject.

Gustavus, which was very extraordinary, if one considers the youthful fire and impetuosity of a temper like his, exhibited strong indications of acquiescing chearfully under all safe and honourable proposals; but as the king of Denmark seemed to discover an unbecoming eagerness for crushing or over-reaching a young unexperienced monarch, he soon gave that artful prince to understand, that he feared him no more in a field of battle, than at a table of conference. Yet here from the very first beginning of war, he convinced the public, that great as his natural courage and vivacity were (and sure a larger share never became the portion of a human being) yet that his reason and good sense still maintained the ascendancy over them; and therefore though it was natural for all bystanders, that a young prince full of enthusiastical gallantry, despising the objections of friends, and the obstructions of enemies, would have began the campaign against Denmark by undertaking the siege of Calmar, (an important place surrendered basely the year preceding) but on the contrary, revolving the enterprize composedly in his mind, and more particularly the strength of the new fortifications, his correct judgment soon got the better of his vivacity; forasmuch as he prefigured to himself the hazard and disappointment that might attend an undertaking of so desperate a complexion; and for these reasons carried the seat of war into Schonen, (to which Christian had retired) and commanded his cousin John, who had raised an army in his own duchy, and wanted to co-operate against the Danes, to make a diversion in Ostrogothia and succour Elfsburg. He then invaded the Danish territories a second time, though the senate requested him not to hazard his person too far, and made reprisals with great advantage, notwithstanding his enemy had received a reinforcement of some German troops under the command of George duke of Lunenberg*; but whether these forces were dispatched by the emperor's connivance or not, (that being a point of great consequence in the history of Gustavus with reference to his future invasion of the German empire) is more than I can take upon me to determine in a satisfactory manner. Be these things as they will, Gustavus laid siege to Elfsberg, wisely foreseeing, that in rendering himself master of this passage and harbour, he should prevent the arrival of fresh succours from Denmark, and impede the retreat of such Danes and Germans as had entered into Sweden, having placed garrisons to obstruct them in their march, in all the fortified towns that lay between them and their native country. During this expedition the Danes gave a part of the king's troops a very dis-

Lütter 1626, and joined the Imperial army with his own regiment. He had for a time in the next year the chief command of Wallstein's troops before Stralsund, but on some disgust joined Gustavus, who replaced him in his old employment. 1612. agreeable camifado †: and a report was spread, (which took its rise from the enemy) that Gustavus was killed, which threw his mother into agonies of affliction; but an express from her careful and affectionate child soon restored her to her former tranquillity. He then marched the residue of his army into Norway, and made a furious irruption in those parts. But to relate every single event of this campaign against the Danes would only prove minute and tedious. It may suffice to observe, that the king had three little armies on foot; the first led by himself, the second in Holland conducted by his cousin John, and the third on the confines, under the command of general Cruse. Duke John received a slight repulse in a rencounter with Christian king of Denmark, and the duke of Lunenberg and Cruse took Nylosia (where 300 of the garrison enrolled themselves under the Swedish ensigns) but wanted strength to reduce Marstrand. Mean while Gustavus collected together several regiments of infantry in the Low Countries, with a small body of mariners; and gave public commissions to various Dutch privateers to interrupt the naval commerce of Denmark ‡.

Nevertheless our young monarch laboured under some difficulties highly disagreeable: for though his enemy on the other hand, Sigismond king of Poland, [whom of all his adversaries, he alone disliked personally, and that for reasons which may easily be conjectured*] had employed himself this year in opposing the Muscovites, yet he contrived to create some incidental business for Gustavus in the province of Livonia, where he was obliged to maintain a considerable body of veteran troops, having a district to defend of 180 miles long, and 90 broad, surnamed by the Swedes Carelia, as it had been conquered by Charles their late king. So that Gustavus having half finished his irruption into Norway, found himself obliged to make a personal appearance in Carelia. At that instant Christian reembarked his troops, and invaded Westergothia a second time, where he rendered himself master of Elsenberg and Goltzberg; and having penetrated above sixty miles into the country, commenced at length the siege of Jencop, which gave him an entrance into the heart of Sweden. This new and unexpected invasion threw Gustavus into great perplexity; he had two games to play, both (not in themselves, but as circumstances then stood) equally interesting. At length not caring to sacrifice his army by a long and precipitate march, (the most troublesome difficulty that can befall a general who is to defend an invaded maritime territory) he ordered the governor of Jencop to ruin the town and adjacent district, and retire with his garrison into the castle. This grand stroke of superior judgment soon carried its advantages with it: yet in spite of all these arts of management and precaution, our young hero, though he considered Sigismund as an imperfect warrior to a certain degree, soon found Christian † to be a soldier of those more exalted parts which a long experience bestoweth; and that he had acquired a correct judgment by a series of misfortunes and ill success: for Christian not only intrenched himself judiciously, and declined fighting, but took his measures upon such principles, that he created obstructions and delays, and made them arise from the very nature of his own plan. Thus by perpetual checks he blunted the impetuosity of our young assailant, mortified his hopes, and wearied out his patience; so that Gustavus finding he could not act in the way he chose, nor shine in that sort of military character he was ambitious of appearing in, equally great in every thing, great in repulses and disappointments, as well as in prosperity and victories, dropped his scheme, and made a peace, (by the mediation of England principally) to the astonishment of all Europe. Indeed it cannot but surprize posterity too, that a prince in the eighteenth year of his age, † Christian IV, king of Denmark, succeeded his father in 1588, being then about twelve years old. He died turned of seventy-one, having reigned in effect near threescore years, though not crowned till 1595. He told d'Avaux the French ambassador, that he was not only at that time the eldest king in Christendom, but that he had seen three changes of sovereigns in almost all the kingdoms and principalities of Europe. The same remark might have been made afterwards by Louis XIV. He had three

Nor may it be amiss to transcribe what a Spanish author saith concerning him. Rey que en setenta annos de edad fatiga lo que otros a veynté, y que estos ultimos sobre tantas prouvas de su valor, en disgracia tubo dicha de acreditarle con un ojo perdido de un cannonazo, pascando en sus naues. Epitome of Cæsar's Commentaries by the Baron de Auchy.

federation, all his elders in point of war and experience, and each his equal, if we consider their riches, possessions, and quantity of troops : so that negative glory in a case circumstanced like his was equal to positive glory in the relative situation of others. What therefore the fire of passion could not effect, (and warmth of temper was the only constitutional infirmity interwoven with his nature) the cool reflexion of reason conducted soon to a fortunate conclusion. And then to make manifest to the world his generous sentiments concerning religion, he established a church at Stockholm for the sole purposes of emigrating Germans.

An extraordinary event which happened in the course of this year, made it plain that Gustavus inherited a portion of his firmness from Christina his mother ; for when John duke of Ostrogothia, who was then but twenty-three years old, conceived the idea of espousing Maria Elizabetha, the young king's whole sister, and his own first cousin, the principal ecclesiastics of Sweden opposed this marriage violently in the assembly of the states, as contradictory to the laws of Scripture † ; but the queen told them with an air of decision, That she had held private conferences with various learned and pious churchmen on the subject in question, and finding nothing therein repugnant to God's word, had reduced her sentiments to one system of compatibility ; adding, moreover, that their opposition was alike unseasonable and improper, since they all knew that the young people had publicly exchanged their promises two years before. " You give me," said she, " advice, which I " no ways demand ; for when papal domination, and the creative " power of producing subtleties are once abolished, it seems to me that " the affairs of marriage appertain to the secular as well as clerical " governors ;" [I am here reciting the queen's own words conformably to the memoirs that lie before me] and therefore concluded she, " give me no farther trouble concerning the present difficulty ; for " your retardments proceed more from a spirit of perplexity than a " love of peace."

But their father, after having lived in marriage twenty-one years with Catharina of Poland, espoused at her death a Swedish young woman of quality, and John was the produce of these second nuptials*.
1613. Whilst the congress lately mentioned sat in full agitation about meer nothings, two other eminent personages (for Sir John Merrick had been dispatched some months before) presented themselves on the part of England, namely, Sir John Merrick, and Anstruther †; the first expedited expressly to Gustavus, the other being only the Britannic ambassador at Copenhagen: the former a good Swede, the latter a well-wisher to the Danes, who of course created delays, and deferred his journey to the very last moment. On his arrival he sent his secretary to Spence (who by the way favoured the cause of Sweden) with intimations to him, that his majesty of Denmark would no ways allow him (namely Anstruther) to make the first visit, and of course requesting Spence to come to his tent without reluctance; which latter informed Oxenstiern immediately of this extraordinary message, who broke forth into a flame all at once, protesting loudly that it was amazing insolence on the part of Denmark to demand precedence over Sweden from pleas of dignity and superiority; and that the contrary practice had ever uniformly been well understood in all public communications between the two kingdoms. And thus at length it was agreed that the two Britons should meet at an assigned place precisely situated half way between their respective tents. Merrick and Spence acted both with great caution and impartiality towards the contending parties, so that Gustavus opportunely and dextrously lent a willing ear to all their proposals, and after a strange variety of delays, obstructions, and punctilios, the treaty was signed January 19, 1613 ‡. For particular reasons it had no preamble, nor was any guaranty admitted, for the king of Denmark could not bear to hear the Hollanders mentioned ||.

‡ The treaty may be seen in Loccenius. Hist.

But what privately disposed Gustavus to listen to an accommodation, 1613. was the deplorable and wretched state of the Swedish marine, at the time he contended with a prince not contemptible for naval forces. As he knew the extraordinary advantages of maritime strength, so he foresaw likewise that such a power could not be created but by perseverance and industry, and therefore chose to obtain a pause of intermission with respect to Denmark. And indeed he had strong reasons to enforce a project of that nature: nor did he ever swerve to the hour of his death from this first idea; for Christian the preceding summer had made a descent near Stockholm, and missed little of destroying the capital; which indeed may be considered as the finest military performance in that prince's life; but Gustavus took care to render the attempt abortive. His next business was to procure the best officers and mariners he could from the dominions of the states general and the Hanseatic towns.

But to return to the treaty. The whole transaction thereof, as I observed before, was operose and tiresome: for half the debate turned upon matters of heraldry and titles. At length the conclusion (which alone carried with it the least glimmering of good politics and sound sense) was, that his Danish majesty should restore Calmar, &c. and keep possession of Elfsburg till Gustavus refunded some satisfactory equivalent. In a word, the Danes demanded one hundred and eighty thousand pounds as an indemnification: allowing the Swedes to call the payment of that money either a reimbursement, or a gratification, as best pleased them; referring the full and ultimate decision to James I, who was to sign the treaty in the character of a person interested. But at length, by the unwearied interposition of the British ministers, it was concluded to make a very small part of the demand supply the place of the whole, and assign the delivery of certain fortresses by way of hypothecation or security. Terms of very hard and difficult digestion! But Gustavus was well disposed and tractable, and the senate without further delay devised means and expedients for discharging the debt. In consequence of which, the principal result was, that both kings were allowed to bear the three crowns for their arms. Christian was to make

From all that hath been said, it will appear plainly to the reader, that reasons of prudence contributed entirely to induce Gustavus to conclude this peace, though at that very time he had made a progress in war which served to astonish the whole European world: for it may be worth observing here once for all, that he, Condé, and his own disciple Forstenfon, were the only three generals who at twenty years of age shewed the public all the effects of a long experience. Nevertheless, the king concluded this peace sub clypeo tantum, (according to the advice of his senate upon another occasion) for he levied just before two good regiments in Scotland and the Low Countries, and hired likewise fifteen ships from the Scottish nation, which plundered the town and district of Dronheim, and sailed afterwards to the southermost shores of Sweden*.

1614. The demands of Denmark being thus completely satisfied, it was thought expedient in the next place, to enter into a fifteen years treaty of commerce and mutual guaranty with the states general; and to this purpose Gustavus dispatched Van Dyck, a favourite minister with his father, in an embassy to Holland, where the whole affair was concluded both effectually and speedily. As to the interior of the realm of Sweden, due and sufficient care was taken both of cities and countries, inasmuch as better means were devised for exercising trade and commerce, both by natives and foreigners; and the farmers and peasants were absolved from supplying horses and carriages gratis to the king's armies. Nor must it here be forgotten, that though Gustavus from a principle of sincere religion, as well as solid policy, had an earnest desire to make his dominions the asylum of all virtuous and industrious emigrants, from other countries, whether papists or protestants, yet still one remarkable restriction was interwoven with the body of the royal edict, namely, that no foreigner or banished person should presume to enter the kingdom without bringing with him letters testimonial concerning his religious and moral deportment from persons of character. After sums (none less than twenty pounds) at 12 per cent. and to encourage this subscription, the persons contributing were exempted from taxes for three years.

Deliberations had been held likewise, and royal constitutions made public, with respect to money, imposts, and certain immunities in point of taxation, distinct from those already mentioned. All possible precautions were taken to establish a peace with Muscovy and Poland; nor did this great and good king, amidst one perplex scene of tumultuous difficulties, forget to regulate the lectures, discipline, and morality of the university of Upsal. It was then concluded that his majesty ought to propose a peace with Muscovy sword in hand; after which ensued a royal edict respecting the jesuits, whom the king disliked more than any set of men in the Christian world; and, lastly, the scene was closed, with what some historians miscall, the famous edict against metaphysics, upon supposition, as they falsely imagined, that he had conceived a mortal aversion to the futility of those studies. But the truth of the matter appears to me in another light. Gustavus had his political reasons for taking this step; Poland was the fountain-head of such sort of reveries; and a tribe of schoolmen of the more refining kind had given philosophical laws to all Europe in that respect. The Swedes for these reasons flocked in great numbers to the universities of Warsaw and Cracow, and imbibed sentiments favourable to Sigismund, and consequently disobliging to Gustavus. Hence it was that the metaphysical science was made only the poor scape-goat upon which our monarch wrecked his just resentments, condemning it in the character of a politician, and not a philosopher. And in consequence of this, a subsequent law was made public, whereof the purport was, that no young man of quality or condition should quit the kingdom without a passport first obtained from the crown, with proviso not to solicit leave to prosecute his philosophical studies and military exercise in a suspected place*.

1613. But to return to the affairs relative between Sweden and Denmark.
1614. Gustavus having embraced in the critical moments a flying and casual incident, which served to throw his Danish majesty into a state of inaction, (the person of his three assailants he disliked the most, for he was cool and reserved, and likewise understood best the profession of war,) found still more work than he chose, in being obliged to carry on a sort of barbarian campaigns against the great duke of Muscovy and the king of Poland. And to understand this situation more clearly with respect to the former, we must resume things a little back. Gustavus's father had sent troops to assist the czar Basil against the enterprizes of Sigismund, by which assistance the Swedes privately hoped to procure prince Charles, Gustavus's brother, to be chosen great duke; the Polanders on the other hand expected that Sigismund might happen to be elected, or Vladisläus his son. But the Muscovites overlooked the pretensions and expectancies of both parties, and following their own free choice reposed themselves upon a genuine descendant of the Demetrian race; upon which the new czar by way of gratitude declared war immediately against Sweden.

And indeed here it is thought by many (for dissimulation will not become a faithful or exact historian) that Charles Philip, Gustavus's brother, might have been elected great duke of the Russias; yet though the king loved him tenderly, he was at the same time too good a politician to wish to see that event realized, being well apprized that certain elevations to power and dignity might remove men beyond the influence of fraternal friendship. Of course he retarded Charles's journey by so many imperceptible delays, (having it is imagined some thoughts of being elected himself) till at length the Muscovites fixed their choice upon another object*.

But notwithstanding the last mentioned opinion which hath been suggested to me, it appears highly probable from the concurrence of history that Gustavus, who had then other affairs upon his hands still more important, never truly and really impeded the election of his brother or of himself. The fact was, that the people of Novogrod had entered into a negotiation with Charles's agents, and these persons were sincerely in earnest, for they made him an offer of their own duchy, without presuming to become answerable for the rest of the Muscovites; but the prince preferred a quiet and well settled appennage at home (for he enjoyed four duchies and the Valensian territory, &c.) to a litigious and turbulent possession amidst a multitude of barbarians. Carolus se ab illis vana spe lætatum esse sentiens, & rem justæ vindictæ a rege fratre & se suo tempore in mobilem gentem exercendæ committens, inde abiit *.

The life of a prince like Gustavus, may be justly divided into two departments, the one civil, and the other military: since we can hardly discover a single moment assigned for relaxation or amusement; and as to pleasure there was neither room to receive it, nor time to indulge it. Nevertheless, if Gustavus had ever leisure to cast his eyes on books of politics and history, (for in fact we find him eminently conversant not only in these studies, but in classical learning, tactics, and mathematics) it must have been principally in the years 1615 and 1616; and yet notwithstanding this remark of mine, a period of time may be very busy, and not devoid of occupations and perplexities, though nothing resulteth thence, sufficient to make a shining figure in future annals. Yet sure it is, that the king passed whole nights in reading the military history of the antients, and often used to say, that the invention of fire arms, and the art of fortifying places, made a wide difference between us and them, yet that a man who possessed the courage of the heroes of antiquity might perform actions as illustrious as theirs. The continuator of Foresti produces the example of Gustavus upon this occasion to shew, that much may be learnt from the antients in point of war, though the manner of attack and defence at present be widely different from what was practised by the Greeks and Romans. There is reason for entertaining the reader with this remark, for the knowledge of battle-plans and fortifications makes but half the science which belongs to a general: it is military and civil policy that help to complete the other half, and these were co-eval with our predecessors, and will remain co-existent with our posterity †.

1615. It may suffice therefore to observe, that in the beginning of the year 1615 he convened the states and orders of the realm at Helsingford *, where, amongst many other important transactions, he introduced and finished one of the greatest acts that a king can perform in times of peace : for he published an edict to abridge the tediousness and expence of law-suits, especially in matters of regal judicature, and prescribed the form and manner how this compendiousness was to be effected. The glorious consequences of which have been enjoyed by Sweden more or less to this present hour : for no king, as the Swedes acknowledge to these very moments, ever devised more salutary, or more sensible laws than Gustavus Adolphus †.

His majesty then, to give every action of his life the fairest and most candid appearance, deputed Oxenstiern ambassador to Christian IV. king of Denmark, with instructions to explain to him, amongst other things, the sincere and honourable intentions that Sweden bore with respect to Muscovy and Poland, and particularly in regard to a permanent, substantial, and well-concerted peace : and as a proof thereof dispatched on the same errand, though without success, Everard Horn, general de la Gardie, and a third deputy to the court of Russia. But the czar persisted inflexible, and of course a war could not be avoided. Which resolution did not greatly discompose Gustavus ; and, in this one instance, the king of Poland thought fit to join him. Nor did he much dislike the military abilities of his new opponent, being a warrior far inferior to his late Danish adversary ; and indeed his great object in the present expedition was not making conquests, but securing to his subjects a firm and lasting peace, and fixing the affairs of public good faith upon solid foundations. For the cause of this quarrel on the side of Sweden, was a refusal the Muscovites made of re-imbursing to the states of Sweden a very considerable sum of money, which they had generously advanced to supply their necessities.

Provoked at such an outrageous act of ingratitude, his Swedish majesty soon rendered himself master of the vast province of Ingria, and took by storm the strong fort of Kexholm, then deemed to be impregnable. In the next place he formed the siege of Plefko, of which the event appeared doubtful to all, but men of great and enterprising genius; and so much the rather, as the wintry season began to approach; but his majesty of Great Britain at the request of the Muscovites graciously interposed his pacific offices: and in consequence thereof Gustavus writ Sir John Merrick an extremely civil and generous letter *, remarking here and there incidentally, “ That he besieged Plefko, not from the ambition “ of taking a fortress supposed inaccessible, but with a view to force the “ enemy into conditions of peace, by an unexpected stroke which carried with it the appearance of performing something in the art of “ war.—All the former part of which, says he to Merrick, you have “ known to be true, and have beheld likewise the obstinacy of the “ Russians and their infidelity.—Hearing no proposals with respect “ to an accommodation, I had reduced the place to the very point of “ capitulating: but notwithstanding all my fatigues, expences, and military losses, upon proviso the Muscovites be duly and justly restrained “ for times to come, I lay my glory a sacrifice at the feet of England, “ with a view to convince mankind in general, that I waged this war “ not from motives of ambition, (for my territories are sufficiently large “ and powerful) but from the mere compulsion and necessity of “ things.—It ever hath been, and is still my inclination to cultivate “ peace and friendship with all my neighbours.—This upon just

 “ and honourable terms is most congenial to my natural temper. But
 “ if a lawful war is not to be healed by conciliatory and reputable measures; We can embrace it with resolution.” And thus the king contented himself with reflecting coolly, even in the earlier parts of life, That the greatest generals predestined to perform the most illustrious actions, are not indispensibly obliged to render themselves masters of every town they think fit to invest †.

Nevertheless it must be observed in regard to the memory of James I. (O si sic omnia fecisset!) that the conditions of agreement were good and honourable;

1615. honourable ; for the enemy refunded to the Swedes a considerable sum of money, under appearance of making amends for the expences of the war, and ceded to them a large part of the continent of Muscovy ; so that the lovers of prediction even then said (so promising were the beginnings of our hero's life) that he had fulfilled in one part that line of conquest on earth which corresponded with the delineation first sketched out for him by Tycho Brahé in the celestial regions *. Nor ought we to forget here, that it was in this campaign he first formed, nurtured and seasoned that invincible body of troops called the Finlanders, and at the conclusion thereof, having brought the national soldiers in general to a more steady and regular sort of discipline, disbanded a large corps of foreign veterans, partly to redress the tacit complaints of his subjects, and partly because he less and less wanted their assistance.

It was likewise during the military operations of this summer, if after all my researches I am not greatly mistaken †, that Gustavus in the twenty-first year of his age gave an extraordinary proof of his enterprising genius, declaring to all his officers that he would lay siege to Notteberg-castle, a place by each of his generals deemed impregnable : being situated on a small island on the mouth of the Narva, more than cannon-shot from either shore ; the conflux of waters on all sides being extremely rapid and impetuous. Representations on representations were offered unto him, but our young hero, like another Joshua, landed his forces and took the fortress by composition, in which were found provisions and ammunition abundantly sufficient to supply the garrison for a twelve month's siege.

And now for a certain pausing-time and interval he returned home : 1615. and enjoying for a short space a moderate repose, which may be called almost the only one he ever tasted from the early parts of youth to the last moments of his life, applied himself with unexampled diligence to comprehend the true nature of commerce, and rendered himself master of that grand monarchical science, the art of easing (as much as in him lay) the taxes of his people. But no where appeared he greater than in the speech * he made his senators at the commencement of the year, when it was necessary to explain his inmost sentiments in the debate which concerned the Russian war. This he performed with attractive grace and powerful demonstration ; with all that eloquence could inspire or reason could confirm ; obviating and overturning that accusation of ambition which some of his subjects tacitly brought against him in their own breasts ; and explaining and answering at the same time the insinuations of certain malevolent libels, which his cousin Sigismund had taken care to see dispersed through Sweden. And thus at once he charmed his subjects and convinced them likewise, that his ambition extended no further than a brave and prudent prince ought to direct it. Of course one uniform universal assent ensued, and the states and orders granted him all supplies that could be concluded necessary.

And indeed whoever peruses carefully the speech I have mentioned (though it is rather too long to be inserted in history) will find a difficult task to abstain from admiring the eloquence of Gustavus, which must have suffered greatly by passing through a northern alembic of coarsely-filtrated latinity. Yet meer oratory being little more than one of the speciosa miracula in the art of reasoning, we shall not fix our principal encomium upon that topic. It is the precision of Gustavus that we admire ; the acumen of the Romans, and the ἀγχινοια of the Athenians ; the possessing an object in the single point of view which is alone material. As to wit, it no where appears that he aimed at it : though he seems to have had a natural turn to repartee and humour ; but there is a poignancy, an apposite pointedness in all his speeches, replies and re-

1615. joinders ; and such I may say, as serve to individuate him from every other man. Not but that upon particular occasions he could expatiate with all the charms of the most persuasive eloquence, of which no farther proofs need be recited than the oration now before us, and those pronounced at Erford and Nurenberg ; but the closer the engagement was, the more the vis viva of his genius shone forth ; and therefore he always chose to discuss matters personally with foreign ministers, and dictate all important instructions to his own ambassadors. Conscious of his abilities in a private chamber he solicited an interview with Christian of Denmark, (one of the subtlest politicians of that age) and obtained the effect desired ; he made the same proposal to Louis XIII, but that prince had just sense enough to dread the experiment, and of course declined it.
1616. The year ensuing was entirely employed in treaty-litigations between the Swedes and the Muscovites, as likewise in contriving farther means to lessen the taxes, and administer ease and plenty to the subjects of Sweden.
1617. At length Gustavus in order to give the world fresh instances of his generosity and sincerity allowed a peace to be concluded at Stolba, after the obstruction of ten thousand ceremonies of precedence and titles, which a proud and ignorant nation like the Muscovites, is always ready to make. And indeed in most, if not all treaties, the grand object is sooner settled, (because better foreseen and understood) than the incidental and collateral ones.

And here it must be observed that the great duke had required permission from the states general and James I. to raise recruits in their respective dominions, which his Britannic majesty made no difficulty of granting, upon condition the men were not to be employed against Gustavus. This damped the czar's ardour not a little, and Sir John Merrick, gentleman of the bed-chamber, was sent ambassador from England (who had discharged a commission to Gustavus at Narva some years before) to give all the assistances he could towards the completion of an accommodation ; by which it was at length stipulated, " That a " general amnesty should be settled between the two nations, the pre" tensions of Charles Philip be extinguished, and free intercourse of “ commerce established; that the Swedes should restore all their con- 1617.

 “ quests, and the great duke in return give back Livonia, renounce the “ title he assumed from it, surrender four towns in the prefecture of “ Novogrod, and refund the Swedes 9000 l. in good and sterling money.
 “ The concluding article was, that neither party should assist Poland in “ any attempts against the two reciprocal crowns *.”

Holland as well as England interposed sincerely in this mediation: yet the treaty was not effectually ratified till the year ensuing. All parties wished earnestly for this event, and all rejoiced in its completion. His majesty of Great Britain in particular shone now in the full meridian of his pacificatory lustre;

 Auderet,volvenda dies en attulit ultro.*

It was about this period that Gustavus borrowed a very considerable sum of the states general, in order to re-imburse the king of Denmark according to the articles of peace lately concluded between them: but as this money arrived not at Hamburg in due time, his majesty (who piqued himself on a punctilious exactness) spared neither application nor pains to procure it in good season from another quarter; nevertheless he received it afterwards on due security, and paid it back in copper-oar †. Nor did the friendship and humanity of the Hollanders stop here; for they gave him permission at or near the same time to levy a body of 2000 men in the United Provinces, and allowed him likewise the year ensuing ‡ to raise a complete regiment of infantry, and a certain definite number of seamen sufficient to equip five ships of force against the Polanders;

1617. and as a terror was then conceived over all the northern parts of Europe, that the court of Madrid, in order to facilitate the future conquests of Sigismund and the emperor *, proposed to send a strong fleet into the Baltic ocean, they generously supplied Gustavus with six men of war, which actually failed under the command of Obdam, vice-admiral of Holland †.

Nor must we omit here that Christian, in consequence of the late accommodation between Sweden and himself, made the king a very genteel and plausible offer of sending a body of Danes to augment his army ; which proposal was accepted with thankfulness, but for certain private reasons politely declined. For Gustavus knew to perfection the address and artifice of his neighbour, and desired nothing from him but a bill of acquittance. He discharged therefore the debt with all imaginable diligence, and employed the moderate overplus that remained in puzzling the fidelity of the governor of Dunamond, which important place soon admitted the Swedish banners to wave upon its ramparts ‡.

During this short pause from military transactions his majesty (having first convened the states) passed through the forms of a coronation at Upsal, and then proceeded to reduce his kingdom more and more to one uniform and well-connected system : settling the interior springs and movements of it upon such a principle of regulation, as that no notable inconveniences or obstructions should arise during his absence in whatever wars he might chance afterwards to undertake. To effectuate this, he made some very sensible alterations in the manner of convening the states and in the dispatch of business, and established five public offices of great extent, namely, a court of justice, a chamber of exchequer, a cancellaria ||, and two councils of war, one for land-affairs and one for the naval ; in each of which departments he appointed himself (absent or present) to be supreme judge and ultimate referendary. These institutions being thus premised, he in the next place augmented and confirmed the privileges of the states and orders ; and to encourage what is usually called the fair and settled trader, published an edict against

And as a war by this time had commenced against him on the side of Poland, he next cast his eyes on his cousin Sigismund in good earnest : concerning whose quarrel and pretensions in order to see the ground-work of them, we must make a small retrospect into the Polish and Swedish histories. Nor can this digression be deemed improper, forasmuch as the war lasted (excepting only some few temporary intermissions) till within three years of our king's death.

Gustavus Ericson, or Vasa, our hero's grandfather, having reigned two and thirty years with the character of another Titus, left behind him three sons. Eric (who had been proposed by his father to queen Elizabeth of England) married a young woman of mean parentage, merely from a romantic turn of love ; but growing discontented, vicious and cruel, was deposed by his own subjects, and thrown into prison. Upon this John, who had been confined for reasons of state in his brother Eric's reign, (but fortunately contrived his escape) was declared successor to the throne. He died in 1592, after having governed four and twenty years ; and then Charles, duke of Sudermania, the younger of the three sons, and father of Gustavus Adolphus, (the posterity of John being set aside by the states) was appointed to succeed him. John by Catharina his wife, daughter of Sigismund II. king of Poland, left two sons, Sigismund, (upon whom the history particularly turneth) and John duke of Ostrogothia, which latter prince, a minor of three years of age when Charles was inaugurated, died without issue in 1618. And in imitation of his father kept firm to the Evangelical or Augustan confession ; but Sigismund, converted by his mother's means, had privately admitted himself into the Romish communion. Charles was a bold and sincere Lutheran ; of course his brother John by his last testament made him a sort of pledge to the people with regard to the protestant religion, and appointed him governor of Sweden till Sigismund should return from Poland. During the interregnum he acquitted himself with the clearest honour, exhorting Sigismund to hasten immediately to Stockholm and 1617. accept the regal title which lay open for him, exhorting and conjuring him at the same time to preserve the protestant religion inviolably to his subjects. Sigismund took no notice of this latter passage, nor gave the least satisfaction concerning it when his subjects presented a particular remonstrance to him. Charles pressed him a second time, and in the interim refused the crown which the senate had offered him. At length Sigismund was enthroned in the year 1594, and took the coronation-oaths, from the observation of which he scholastically absolved himself with all the dexterity of a Polish metaphysician. "This oath" (declareth the juror,) "I religiously promise and vow to keep to all my subjects, young and old, born, and to be born, beloved, or not beloved, absent or present, no way infringing, but rather improving the same by royal affection: so God be propitious to my soul and body." At the same time it was stipulated likewise, that Sigismund should make profession of the Lutheran religion, and introduce no foreigners into the kingdom *; and some time afterwards, upon his temporal repudiation from Sweden and dismissal into Poland, his once-electors shewed so much justice and generosity to him and his family, as to keep the succession open upon eventual provision that his son Vladislais, then a youth of twelve years old, should receive his education at Stockholm, and there make profession of the protestant religion †.

Nevertheless during this interim, after full proof given to the public of various breaches of trust, equivocations, tergiversations, persecutions, and violations of property on the part of Sigismund, duke Charles by the universal voice of the people was invited to accept the crown October 22, 1595, which honour in hopes of some accommodation he declined heroically for several years; but in the year 1600 the states of the kingdom lost all patience; and an act was passed, not only to incapacitate Sigismund and his heirs, but to establish Charles as king, and appoint the young Gustavus, then six years old, for his successor. Nay such was the extraordinary zeal of the people in behalf of their civil and religious liberties, that a declaratory clause was added to this effect, that regal obedience and allegiance should be paid Charles, though he declined to assume the title of king, and though the coronation-ceremonies had not been performed. And therefore, let historians speak what they please, it is possible Charles had some doubts with relation to John, prince of Ostrogothia, a youth at that period eleven years old, and bred a Lutheran, who had an hereditary title antecedent to his own, (being his brother the late king's second son :) who by way of compensation had been created duke of Ostrogothia, &c. But be that as it may, Charles, one way or other, was reasoned and compelled, as it were, into the acceptance of what others not only passionately long for, but commit so many crimes in order to obtain ! so at length he submitted to be crowned in form in 1607 ; upon which event popery was declared a religious and political incapacity in all future kings ; no hereditary princes were allowed to marry a wife who professed an erroneous religion ; and all seducers of princes from the doctrines of the established church, were to be punished as traitors and conspirators against their country. On the other hand, the Swedish reasons for depriving Sigismund and incapacitating his heirs, ran conformably to the tenour of the following representation : Namely, for the departure of him, Sigismund, from the received established Christian religion then predominant in Sweden ; contradicting the intent of his grandfather's last testament, and violating the oath taken at his coronation, and neglecting the promise made by him to his late father never to infringe the rights of Sweden, nor subscribe (when removed to another country) to any decisions relative to that kingdom, without previously applying to the states, and requesting their advice and concurrence therein. He was accused further of leaving the realm at several junctures, without due and legal notice given ; of removing sundry papers of great importance out of the national cancellaria, exciting war against his own country, and his singularly best friend and adviser, duke Charles his uncle. It was objected moreover, that he had allowed Denmark to insert the three Swedish crowns in the regal arms ; that he had employed a naval force against his country, turned a deaf ear to the remonstrances of a free people, and refused to educate his son at Stockholm, in order to render him capable of inheritance.

Nevertheless,

1617. Nevertheless, in despite of all these incapacities and disqualifications alledged, Sigismond, who was a prince of a restless, turbulent, cabaling, and ambitious spirit, employed all the time that intervened between the publication of these resolutions, till the period I am hastening to reconsider, in projecting and executing an infinity of attempts in order to repossess the crown aforesaid. To this purpose he posted a set of political missionaries throughout the kingdom of Sweden, and assigned them their separate incendiary departments with equal judgment and dexterity; and had caused remonstrances, defamatory libels and manifestos of war, to be dispersed every where in great abundance. And as they all took their rise first from the Polanders, and not from native Swedes, Gustavus determined, partly to mortify Sigismond, and partly to prevent considerable sums of money from being spent out of his country, (not to mention some other inconveniences) to publish an edict with prohibition to his subjects of pursuing their studies in Polish universities, paying visits to the court, or holding any correspondence with the inhabitants of that kingdom. Now though Gustavus managed the pen with the same address as he wielded the sword, yet he no ways considered a paper-war as a contestation in any shape desirable; especially as it was conducted by a nation formed by nature for school-distinctions and aerial refinements: where the jesuits likewise presided in council, and mixed the politics of Loyola with the sophistry of Smiglecius, and the plausible elegance as well as specious arrangement of Socinus. These circumstances determined him to cut the knot of controversy with that magical sword of his, concerning which the Swedish and German professors have produced more dissertations than one.

Yet still the unquiet and malevolent Sigismond continued to publish fresh defamatory libels, and new devised pretensions and claims upon the crown of Sweden. That he breathed revenge and war appeared manifest to all men; and it is supposed by the more clear sighted and enlightened*, that the hopes of this desperate and hazardous enterprize were founded upon Austrian promises of supplying the Polish army with a body of troops sufficient to re-conquer the dominions of Sweden.

And from this hardly visible embryo of existence, from this diminutive spark of latent fire, arose afterwards those amazing flames which burnt with inextinguishable fierceness for eighteen years, and reduced the empire to an heap of ruin. For Gustavus from a youth never truly relished any interposition which took its rise from Vienna, (as we suggested before in the supposed assistance under the duke of Lunenburg sent by the emperor to the king of Denmark) and as he knew the Imperial court to be of a phlegmatic temper originally in the preparation of expeditions, (Sigismund at that time being counselled and governed by Hispaniolized Germans, and not native Polanders, which was a singular oversight) he seized the flying opportunity to a moment, having first summoned a flight convention at Orebroy, and embarked for Livonia under the protection of eighteen ships: well foreseeing, that the pre-occupation of this province would obstruct all attempts from Poland during the remaining parts of the campaign. He then took Dunamond (having paved the way to that incident as we hinted before) and Windau. The former place was the key to Riga.

No prince ever made a better choice of invading Poland with uncommon dexterity; for Gabriel Bethlem, prince of Transylvania, exasperated to the highest degree against Sigismund, who had assisted the emperor in the Hungarian war, (for Bethlem had lately invaded Hungary) formed a design to conquer Moldavia, part of which then belonged to his Polish majesty, and drew the Turks and Tartars into the project, who assisted him with an inconceivable number of forces †: but as the king of Poland appeared to be overmuch entangled by an irruption truly barbarian on the other side of his dominions, Gustavus (having pre-occupied what he thought for himself barely reasonable and convenient, for the whole province of Livonia lay exposed to his mercy: a moderation not to be found in a victorious prince) generously concluded a truce with Sigismund for two years, upon that monarch's humble request and supplication; under restriction however, that the intermediate space should be employed in projecting means to establish a permanent and substantial peace. All which may be considered as a mag-

1617. nificent instance of heroical supererogation, not to be paralleled in common histories; for which Sigismond made him afterwards very ungracious and illiberal returns.
1618. Gustavus allowed his adversary this parenthesis of repose, (if the expression may be permitted me) in order to enable him to chastise the barbarians who so furiously invaded him, and give him scope likewise, provided he was sincere, to settle amicably and by mutual consent all the differences that subsisted between the two kingdoms. This he did for his own honour, merely to divest Sigismond of all justifiable and plausible pretensions of undertaking a second war at conjunctures and opportunities more convenient. Yet still Gustavus had some private misgivings (and time afterwards proved how very just his divinations were) that an unfair and insidious adversary, like the person in question, having once disembarrassed himself from such troublesome enemies as Turks, Tartars and Transylvanians, might create fresh unsubstantial objections and delays, and set himself to renew hostilities against Sweden with redoubled vigour. A few months soon realized this inauspicious conjecture; and as Gustavus piqued upon acting openly and with spirit, he demanded the promise of a perpetual peace or a well prolonged armistice when the truce expired; and receiving no categorical assurances on the part of Poland, renewed the war without any ulterior messages or declarations: having first obtained the full approbation of an unanimous senate, and solemnly confirmed the peace with Muscovy on the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul in the great church at Stockholm.

Princes of a lesser genius would have given this unexpected stroke of an invasion, under the disguised appearance of feeling the pulse of an accommodation: making protestations one way, and acting in another way distinctly contrary. Timorous and weak men always shelter themselves in dark and serpentine by-paths; for it requires great parts to be at the same time prudent and brave; successful and explicate! There was the like difference between Gustavus and Sigismond, as betwixt Oxenstiern and Mazarin; the one executed what he determined, nobly, firmly, and instantaneously; the other brought to pass, what he had had combined together after a million of reflexions, with a certain meanness, timidity, and hesitation. One performed the most momentous actions by that glance of judgment which precisely seizes the critical object and occasion, without allowing the mind to wander a moment under the influence of any by-considerations; the other making up by philosophy and induction what he wanted in presence of mind and acumen, puzzled himself by a multiplicity of political knowledge, saw too little, by seeing too much; was often by caution betrayed into danger, and fell into real fears at the same moment he avoided supposable ones.

But to return to Gustavus, concerning whom we ought to remark transiently, that this cautious, just, and sensible young man, did not think it consistent with prudence and equity to make Poland the seat of hostilities, till he had first discharged the residue of arrears due to Christian king of Denmark. In the beginning of the autumn therefore (for the campaign this year commenced no sooner) he paid the remaining sum due for the redemption of Elfsburg, and by his promptness, as well as dexterity of conduct, kept the rear of his dominions free from a troublesome interfeerer and invader, who acquiesced with reluctance, being precluded from all possible means of devising a pretext for renewing of hostilities.

And it was about this time that Gustavus obtained several valuable territories and possessions by the death of his cousin John duke of Ostrogothia*: and in the same year one of his castles where he lodged took fire during the night, which spread itself round with so much vehemence, that the doors and stair-cases were all involved in flames; so that he and his chancellor were obliged to throw themselves out at a window, in which extraordinary attempt he suffered inconsiderably, but Oxenstiern received some very disagreeable contusions. Nor did the danger cease here, for as the castle was begirt with a moat, which almost touched the edifice, his majesty was obliged (so great was the violence of the fire) to cross that moat by venturing up to the shoulders in ooze and filthiness †.

1619. During the course of the ensuing year, the Polish war began to grow languid on either side : nor was more fuel administered to the fire than what just sufficed to preserve it from expiring. Mean while Gustavus returned to Stockholm, and having well reformed and improved his navy, rendered it respectable throughout the whole European ocean. He then passed a revision over the duties and business of every particular land officer and private soldier, and reduced not only the art of fighting and sieges, but the whole military discipline to one regular system of his own invention †. The very instruments of war were brought by him to a particular examen; the management of large artillery was rendered more scientific; the encumbrance and other defects of the match-lock were rectified; the rest of the pike was abolished, and the pike was shortened; and perceiving that Sweden (though it abounded in the very materials from whence these implements were composed) remitted large sums annually to Spain, Lombardy, and Venice, (for a man of service in those days could use only the pistols and carabines of Brescia, or a sword tempered in the Ebro) he bethought himself prudently and sensibly to establish manufactures of arms in all convenient places throughout his whole dominions. In all which instances, not to subjoin a great number of others, as the reformation of law, and abridgment of law-suits, &c. &c.; he has been wisely and faithfully copied by a prince who bears a reference to him in similitude of actions, as well as in the likeness of situation. But the parallel is too plain to be dwelt upon with more minuteness.

And lastly, as it was a maxim with Gustavus to perform as much as he could in his own person, he requested an interview at a frontier town called Ulfsbeck (others say Halmstadt) with Christian king of Denmark, in order to leave his dominions unexposed to any invasions from that quarter; and all these difficulties being previously adjusted, he published the famous constitution, De administratione & incrementis civitatum in regno Suecico. But there still remained another reason for renewing a good understanding between Sweden and Denmark, for the kings of either country plainly apprehended, that the new commotions in Bohemia and the incorporated provinces deserved to be watched with an eye of vigilance. And therefore having exchanged all matters of compliment and civility on an open plain, with ensigns flying, drums beating, and a reciprocal discharge of musquetry from the little armies that escorted them, they retired to a neighbouring city, and passed the space of time from February 25th to March 11th in hospitality and friendship*.

Nor was Gustavus's attention to the troubles of Bohemia and the annexed territories ill directed; for Sigismond at that moment had decreed a body of Cossacks to march to the emperor's assistance, and had exhorted by letters the duke of Lignitz protestant general in Silesia, and the Bohemian nobles to make their timely submissions to the court of Vienna †.

In the year 1620, when Gustavus was meditating how to make an effectual invasion into Poland, (which project was carried into execution the ensuing year) Sigismond formed a design, say some, to entrap this enterprizing and magnanimous neighbour. With his connivance and privity therefore, colonel Farenbach had orders to make an offer of surrendering into Gustavus's hands several fortified towns in Livonia, with a view thereby to seize his Swedish majesty at some conference thereupon to be held, and make him prisoner; but the stratagem by some chance or other took air, and the whole negotiation vanished in an instant. And thus Sigismond was obliged to repossess his towns; nor did the loss of them discontent Gustavus, as he still continued proprietor of his own person and liberty.

By Farenbach's appearing at this time in the Polish service, (for though a Lifelander by birth, he had born command under the house of Austria) it is pretty certain, that a sort of clandestine assistance (though the point hath hitherto been over-looked in history) had been conveyed into Poland by the Austrian ministers nine years at least before the noted period of Walftein's dispatching colonel Arnheim upon that errand at the head of 10000 men; which shews, that the pique

1620. and resentment which the king of Sweden had conceived against his Imperial majesty was an inveterate wound of long duration, and the memory thereof pre-disposed him for a number of years, (though reasons of prudence checked his inclination) to make some honourable reprisals by a German invasion in his own behalf, whenever a proper opportunity should present itself.

But to return from this slight digression: notwithstanding I have thus related the audacious enterprize of Farenbach ex fide codicum, yet still it is my own private opinion, that his want of sincerity in this affair pointed towards Sigismund, and not Gustavus; for why otherwise should the prince last mentioned admit him afterwards into his service, and entrust him with large sums of money, in order to levy 3000 men in Holland and Denmark? Yet though Farenbach at this period of time appeared not to be a villain in the eyes of Gustavus, nor perhaps was he; nevertheless he soon convinced the public, how dangerous it was to repose any trust or confidence in him, for he ran away with the king's money, and enrolled himself a second time under the Imperial ensigns; and he it was who at the head of his German regiment first entered the town of Bamberg in 1632, when Tilly's army fell upon the troops commanded by Horn, and obliged that general to retreat; which vigorous attack ruffled the temper of Gustavus for a few moments, as it was the first and only small disgrace worth notice which the Swedish armies met with during two of the most extraordinary campaigns that perhaps ever were made.

This Farenbach was one of the strangest mixtures of inconstancy, perfidiousness, ability, and bravery, that is to be found in modern history. For at the time he beat the Swedes at Bamberg, he corresponded with Gustavus at Mentz and Francfort: and at length (though this indeed happened near twelve months after the king's death) was condemned publicly at Ratisbon, upon presumption of having maintained an epistolary intercourse with the late Gustavus, in reference to betraying the town of Ingoldstadt, which general Cratz intended to deliver up in the same manner the ensuing year. As officers of fashion in those times were beheaded, without being disgraced with bonds or fetters, he

frung from the scaffold, and wresting a partizan from the hands of one of the guards, killed four soldiers directly, and wounded several; but at length was oppressed by numbers, and cut to pieces. In that instant a courier arrived from Vienna, with a reprieve, or pardon, obtained by the intercession of his lady and friends, (for in him fell the best engineer in the Austrian service, having learnt his profession under no less person than Gustavus) upon which incident an Italian author*, with all the gravity of a Spanish casuist, gives this sober moralizing advice; “ Courteous reader, if ever it is thy misfortune to be condemned to execution, walk slow, create excuses, and devise delays; who knows but a pardon may arrive the very last moment?”

And now Gustavus thought fit to embark in a different enterprise from all those already recited: for pre-supposing that one day or other he might find himself embroiled with the house of Austria, which seemed (in case she could once thoroughly humiliate the princes of the evangelical union) to aspire at nothing less than universal monarchy, he judged it highly expedient to make a tour through the empire †, attended only by a friend and some domestics, under the disguised name of monsieur GARS ‡; which four letters being sagaciously analysed, make the four initials of Gustavus Adolphus Rex Sueciæ. When this precisely happened, I was long at a loss to form any solid and well grounded conjecture. Some suppose it to be just before he invaded Germany, which appeareth improbable ||; but an excellent book lately published , (the preface to which may be considered as a master-piece of historical correctness) gives us assurance in so many words, “ That Gustavus in the summer of the year 1620 passed in a disguised habit through the chief towns in Germany, and ended his journey at the court of Berlin, in order to see the young princefs of Brandenburg, whom he intended to marry ††.” So great an idea had he of previous certainty in matters of love, as well as in affairs of war.

1620. And here a second particularity deserves some notice. I have been assured by a person of excellent parts lately deceased, who had travelled many years in search of historical knowledge, that the name of Gustavus Adolphus is enrolled among the students of Padua; but if ever that prince was there, it must have been in his younger days, as I hinted before, or by making a romantic digression from this present peregrination. Upon the like authority it was moreover assured me, that Oliver Cromwell appears to be registered in the same Paduan matricula, and yet history maintaineth a profound silence in both these respects; though each passage (except my memory deceives me) is confirmed by a modern Italian author, in his account of that feat of learning; but as I neither remember the writer's name, nor have the performance by me, it becomes me to express my sentiments on the subject with reserve and diffidence.

It is highly probable that the tender and warlike passions alike engaged his Swedish majesty to make a journey into the empire. He had a view perhaps, even so far back as the present period, of having something to say to the Germanic system: and as to Maria Eleonora, sister to George William then elector of Brandenburg*, then in the twentieth year of her age; she appeared to be a consort worthy of him, both as a heroine and a Christian. By a painting I have seen of her, she was a beauty of the graceful and majestic kind: and moreover, a connection with her brother was not to be overlooked by one, who had conceived an idea of erecting some future edifice upon German ground. Nor may the person of Gustavus be passed by here without remarking, that he was one of the tallest and most graceful figures in all his army, large limbed, but not corpulent: yet something inclined to plumpness towards his latter days, though his bulk never encumbered or incommoded him; his eyes of light gray had a piercing clearness attempered with benignity, except when anger discomposed them; his hair fair

In more barbarous ages his look and stature might have advanced him to the regal dignity: for hardly a Swedish horse could carry him when completely cloathed in armour; but by all the paintings and prints I have ever seen of him, of which the number cannot be recounted, he appears, even making allowances for the mode of dress, to be much older than he really was, which I attribute to the violent constant fatigues of his mind and body. There is a thoughtfulness mixt with spirit in all his looks when well drawn, and a sort of recollection joined with fortitude. And indeed, as he united the statesman with the warrior, neither his limbs nor his mind were ever at ease; for he negotiated and made campaigns, without ever being disinayed or puzzled, from the seventeenth year of his age to the hour of his death. So that no warrior or minister ever better deserved the device and inscription on a medal which an ingenious foreigner, the chevalier Edlinger, once shewed me; the emblem was a cube, with this motto, AEQUALIS SEMPER ET ERECTUS.

Gustavus introduced his queen into Stockholm with extraordinary pomp, and the nuptials being there solemnized, appointed the ceremony of her coronation in the month of November. This illustrious and amiable princess, after one or two disagreeable miscarriages, at length brought him a daughter called Christina in 1623, who died the ensuing year; and then a second Christina, who at a year old was declared by the states heiress to the throne in 1627. This decree of the senate is still to be seen*.

Mean while Gustavus made great preparations for war by sea and land, and introduced a secular solemnity in memory of the reformation established in Sweden. The edict against travelling was enforced likewise by additional clauses, (inasmuch as such practice thinned the kingdom of subjects, and promoted evil designs from enemies) yet leave was allowed the nobility, out of regard to their antient privileges, to pursue their studies, or cultivate the art of war in foreign countries, upon 1620. condition they first obtained a royal passport, and resided not in suspected places. Lastly, a new attention was given to the army and navy, and a slight tax levied to that effect upon corn and cattle.

His Polish majesty at the same time, whilst Gustavus was employed in the pursuits of love and glory, escaped fortunately from a sudden danger in his own capital at Warsaw: for one Piecharfchi *, a nobleman of distinction, had conceived a violent aversion against his sovereign, partly on account of his political and military conduct, (for he gave the better half of his time to music and chymistry, and twice lost the throne of Muscovy by his neglect †) and partly because his majesty had assigned curators to take upon themselves the management of his estates, which were very considerable: representation being made that he was discomposed in his intellects. Like Felton his successor in that desperate trade, who assassinated Buckingham, he was supposed to have no participant in the undertaking; but one morning as the king, attended by his courtiers and guards, entered the vestibule of the great church, Piecharfchi started from behind a private door with a small battle-axe in his hand, and suddenly assailing the person of his master, gave him two strokes, one on the cheek, and one on the shoulder. Sigismond dropt immediately, but neither wound proved mortal. Few people were in the church, and fewer still observed the blows. Mean while a poor Italian musician who belonged to the choir, but could not speak half a sentence of Polish, augmented the confusion (for he beheld the whole affair) with crying aloud, Traditore, traditore! which the by-standers concluding to signify Tartari, rushed out of the cathedral to save themselves, supposing that an inundation of barbarians had burst into the city ‡. Vladisläus the king's son, assisted by a croud of courtiers, soon seized the assassin and disarmed him. He made no confession nor acknowledgement, lamenting only that his right arm had deceived him. His breasts were torn off at two different gates of the city with red-hot pincers, which operation he submitted to without a word or a groan*. His limbs were then disparted by wild horses and burnt, and their ashes thrown into the Vistula. 1620.

By this time Gustavus was determined to reduce Poland to reason by some methods or other: of course he made the Poles repeated offers of prolonging the truce, or concluding a peace, but Sigismund, notwithstanding the Turks, Tartars, and Muscovites attacked him on every side, persevered inaccessible, in opposition to all advances that could be made towards him on the part of Sweden. Upon this Gustavus declined the ceremony of previously dispatching an herald to denounce his intentions; as he understood the war, in the language of the jus-publicists of that age, to be protractum duntaxet, non sublatum. Therefore for prudent reasons, conformable to his natural spirit and turn of mind, he began the campaign, at the head of four and twenty thousand men, with a very critical and difficult undertaking, the siege of Riga, the capital city of Livonia; wisely pre-supposing, that the reduction of the province would depend entirely upon the fate of the metropolis. Riga was a large city, the emporium of all the countries that lay round it, well fortified, according to the usages of those days, and carrying on a considerable commerce. It stands on the river Dwina, which divides it into two unequal parts, not to mention its being protected by a safe and commodious harbour, removed about two leagues from the ocean. This town belonged originally to the knights of the Teutonic order: it then formed itself into a republic, and submitted to Poland on the same footing with Dantzic.

Had Gustavus been of a timorous or superstitious temper, he suffered enough at the beginning of this enterprize to have deterred him from the attempt. A violent storm in the mouth of the Dwina dispersed and shattered a good part of his fleet, in spite of all the care of Gildenheim and Fleming, the two admirals; but his maxim was always to gain ground upon disappointments, and redouble his activity, instead of wasting time in unavailing reproaches upon himself or others.

* Laurea Austriaca, p. 341, &c.

1621. Keeping his eye therefore firm on his object, he landed his four and twenty thousand men, and invested the city. The principal officers that served under him were De la Gardie, Wrangel, Horn, Banier, Oxenstiern, and Ruthven a Scottish colonel: names well known in the succeeding parts of our history. Mean while his re-assembled fleet protecting the mouth of the harbour, conveyed to him all proper supplies, and prevented not only the enemy, but all neutral powers from throwing any relief into the town, whether of men, ammunition, or provisions. What was still more fortunate for him, the grand signior had relinquished purposely the siege of Babylon, in order to pour the whole torrent of his forces into Poland*; so that 60000 troops, under the conduct of an old and experienced officer, namely, Chodkiewi prefect of Lithuania, (who died soon afterwards of a broken heart) were looked upon as nothing more than barely sufficient to check the depredations of 300,000 infidels.

Now though Gustavus effected the debarkation of his troops at Mulgrab with great dexterity (a circumstance of war then little known, and to which he gave uncommon attention) yet it was not in his power to perform any service very remarkable, till velt-maréchal De la Gardie arrived with the Finland regiments. His majesty then opened his intentions to the soldiers in a set speech, and having run a line round Riga, invested it according to form: encamping chiefly on the sandbanks to the east of the Dwina. In his own quarter, which consisted of 6000 foot and 800 horse, served prince Charles his brother, Oxenstiern, Horn, Banier, and count Mansfelt. De la Gardie extended himself on the king's right hand, having under his command the pretorian foot-guards, and three regiments of infantry, (making 4500 men) and 300 horse. Wrangel directed the third station at the head of his own and Ruthven's foot-regiments, with 700 cavalry; being ordered to encamp on the king's left hand, at or near a place called Heintz's farm: and Seaton, a Scots gentleman, commanded the fourth division, which lay encamped round a wind-mill, and was nearest the town. Mean while colonel Henry Fleming (for the admiral was named Claudius) having turned his foldiers into pioneers, guarded the iflands in the Dwina, and alfo the weftern fhore of that river next to Dunamond-fortrefs, whilst the fhips lay ftationed in the mouth of the harbour. I am the more minute in defcribing the difpofitions of this fiege, as it was the firft Gustavus made in full form, and as it was a mafter-piece in the intentive parts of war, (wherein his great talent lay) notwithstanding all the operofe and expenfive performances of Spinola in the Low Countries fome few years before.

The town of Riga was well prepared for defence in every refpect. It was guarded with good baftions and well-fraifed half-moons; the citadel was garrifoned with a confiderable body of regular infantry, and two troops of horfe; and the citizens undertook to fupcradd to them 400 experienced foldiers, and their own militia. How well they performed their duty, the duration of the fiege will foon fhew; for their attachment to Sigifmond's intereft appeared to be quite enthuftical.

Gustavus fpared his attention upon no occafions; and on every cafual occurrence hazarded his perfon without difficulty. As it was the firft fiege of confequence he ever engaged in, he appeared, if I may be allowed the expreffion, a very Proteus in command; fuftraining in the fame day the characters of general, engineer, common affailant, and pioneer; for at Riga in particular he often ftripped to his fhirt, and wrought in the trenches with pick-axe and fhovel, exhorting his brother Charles Philip, and the feveral officers who flood round, to follow the example.

This unparalleled vigilance and application to every object, greater or leffer, foon threw him into the way of danger: for in fome preparatory meafures he took on the fand-hills in his own quarter, he miffed little of difproving an obfervation made by Charles V, that no king had ever been killed by a cannon-ball , fince a fhot of confiderable fize paffed directly on the very line where he flood a few moments before. Some time afterwards he conceived his prefence to be neceffary where Seaton commanded, and there a fecond fhot killed fome foldiers that flood near him, and dafhed the blood of lieutenant-colonel Stakelberg upon 1621. his cloaths; and on another occasion, during the continuance of this siege, a third cannon-ball pierced his tent, and glanced towards him in a direction, as if it was predestined to destroy him. Upon these events he changed the position of his batteries, and made himself master of higher ground, commanding the town and raking the streets through and through where-ever the least opening presented itself. But as he chose not to introduce an invasion with acts of bloodshed, foreseeing well that it was almost impossible to enter the town by storm, he sent his trumpeter to the commander and magistrates three several times with proposals of an honourable nature, conceived in courteous terms; but they on the last message, in order to preclude all hopes of accommodation, received and dismissed the royal ambassador blindfolded, returning him to his master quite overcome with spirituous liquors, and without an answer. Upon this the Swedes redoubled the efforts of their batteries, and threw more bombs into the town than ever had been known in so short a space with the same quantity of artillery. What kept alive the spirits of the defendants, was a reliance on Sigismund's promise of raising the siege: but that prince was so embarrassed by the Turkish invasion, that it was not in his power to make good his intentions to any notable purpose. Wherefore to remedy this defect, Radzivil prefect of Lesser Lithuania, and one of the first men of quality in Poland, marched such troops as could be spared, namely, 10000 foot and 4000 cavalry, to the assistance of Riga; nevertheless, astonished at the precautions Gustavus had taken, he contented himself with gazing at a distance from the banks of the Dwina. He had only such troops with him as in the emergency of affairs could then be dispatched, proposing to throw some supplies into the town, in case he had not the ability to raise the siege. The besieged, conducted by one Burk an Irish officer, made two attempts to cross the Dwina in ships, and secure an entrance to some of Radzivil's troops: but Gustavus thundered upon them in such a manner from his batteries, erected previously on the shore for that purpose, that it was thought proper to discontinue all future attempts of the like nature. Mean while the king, by way of gallantry, entertained Radzivil with a general cannonade; and as one ball happened to pierce the tent of that commander, he entered into a slight ineffectual skirmish the next day, and then departed. Upon this the king redoubled his efforts, and filled the town-ditch with fascines and rubbish, having first cut off the communication with the rivers, and rendered himself master of Dunamond-fortress, a strong place to the north of Riga. He then sent the magistrates a fresh summons, admonishing them of their danger, and the impossibility of their relief, to which they returned an abrupt and rude refusal; enraged at which, he took an half-moon by storm, and the garrison in return sprung a mine that lay beneath it, and blew up an hundred Swedish soldiers into the air; nevertheless, their companions re-possessed the ruins, and made a fresh lodgment among them. The art of mining was carried to great perfection in this siege, for both parties made various extraordinary efforts, which almost deserve to be repeated; and his majesty himself still continued to work with his Dalecarnian miners below ground, with the same spirit as he had laboured with the hardy Finlanders above ground in first opening the trenches. At length a breach was made, and Gustavus, in order to pass the town-ditch, formed the first idea of a project which he executed afterwards more gloriously on the banks of the Elb and Lech. In a word, he contrived a flying bridge of wood, and rendered the surface rough and unslippery, with strong nails and pitched sackcloth, seizing the opportunity under favour of the night to throw it cross the fossé, which, though filled with fascines and rubbish, retained still too much water to admit the passage of a large body of men. The colonels Seaton and Horneck * conducted the attack, but the ardour of the troops, which crowded forwards in greater numbers than was ordered for the first detachment, unfortunately broke down the machinery; inasmuch as neither admonitions nor threatenings could restrain their impetuosity. In this accident the gallant Seaton broke his thigh, undergoing afterwards an amputation; and the garrison at night reduced the royal architecture to an heap of ashes.

* This colonel was condemned afterwards in Germany for cowardice, but the queen begged his life.

1621. Gustavus, not in the least dismayed by this disappointment, applied himself once more to mining, being resolved, if he could not pass over the ditch, to enter the town beneath it. He laboured therefore in a fresh mine that very night; for the besieged still expected (contrary to all probability) a second relief from Sigismund. During this interval, the king ordered his young military favourites Horn and Banier, attended by Chapelle, a French officer, and Muster, a Scotsman, to storm the sand half-moon at the head of 3000 chosen soldiers. These brave warriors soon crossed the ditch, and dislodged a part of the enemy; but when they approached the summit of the fortification, the besieged made such an incredible resistance, that they were repulsed by main force. Beams of wood were thrown upon them in order to crush them, and huge stones and grenades dispersed among them in every part. Chapelle's son died bravely, for he continued fighting to the very last; Horn and Banier were both grievously wounded, but his majesty to comfort them, though unsuccessful, sent them both the order of knighthood that very evening. Upon this slight superiority the garrison proposed a sally, but the prudent magistracy imposed a negative on so rash an undertaking.

And now, towards the middle of September, matters approached to the very last extremity, for the Swedes had formed their mines under the town-ditch, and beneath the fortifications that lay round it, whilst the king (in order to prevent supplies from entering the city) having thrown a strong boom cross the Dwina, (which some have thought to be his own invention) and prepared two new bridges capable of admitting five soldiers in front, his determination was to fire the mines at once, pass his assailants over the bridges in two places, and give the town a general assault with all his army. It was then the inhabitants, after an obstinate defence for the space of six weeks, began first to be terrified: for on the one hand the king had undermined their walls in every part, and on the other hand their garrison was enfeebled, their ammunition consumed, and all hopes of relief appeared chimerical and insubstantial. Now though Gustavus knew their distresses, he affected studiously not to discern them, in order to give the Livonians a right notion notion of his generosity. Morally certain of possessing Riga in a day and a night, he allowed the besieged a deliberation of six hours, at the conclusion of which hostages were explained, and a capitulation ratified. Mean while, from a true sense of military merit, he granted the inhabitants very honourable conditions, though they had spoken of him during the siege in disrespectful and injurious terms *, and permitted them to incorporate themselves into one system with his own subjects. These acts of benignity and magnificence arose partly from the dictates of his own heart, and partly from a good maxim of policy, always to behave humanely and generously in a conquered country; of course he never once upbraided the natives for the fatigues and mischief their obstinate resistance had created to himself and his troops. And as all great and good men, however modest they may be, feel some complacency upon having rightly performed any noble and illustrious action, his majesty in the famous speech he made nine years afterwards to the generals of his army near Nurenberg, on the subject of their avarice, cruelty, and expletions, in a decent transitory manner just suggests to their recollection his own dissimilar conduct at the surrender of Riga.

But to return to my subject; the instant Gustavus entered the town-gate, he directed his steps to the great church of St. Peter, where he kneeled down, and returned his thanks to God in a short prayer. As to allegiance, he told the inhabitants, he never desired or expected better from them, than they had shewn their former master: upon which account he should not only preserve their privileges, but augment them. The magistracy then apologized for their conduct with respect to Poland, obliquely upbraiding Sigismond, after the representations they had made him of their imminent danger, for returning this cold and jejune answer, namely, that the palatin of Wilno (who at that time was employed in Podolia) ought to have taken due care of the Livonian territory.

They then told his majesty likewise †, that Gustavus made a swifter passage from Stockholm to Riga, than Radzivil had done from Poland to Riga, and that though the latter commanded troops enough to have answered the purpose, yet the pre-occupation of the country by Gustavus entirely

† In a memorial, dated at Riga Sept. 20, 1621. frustrated

1621. frustrated all his attempts, inasmuch as his Swedish majesty had rendered himself master of every strong pass, and stopped the navigation of the Dwina (in which circumstance at that time consisted one great part of the military science.) They then expatiated much on the clemency and affability of their new conqueror, who far from reproaching them for having made a resistance so detrimental to him, told them from his own pure generosity in so many words, that if a solid peace could be concluded between him and Sigismund in three years, he would allow them to return to their Polish allegiance, with reservation of all their antient rights and liberties: concluding with this remark, That whoever had occasioned the loss of their city (and whom he meant is easy to be discovered) must render account for it at the last day to the Supreme Being *: and thus the affair ended.

To this remonstrance Sigismund had not the condescension to return an answer: but prince Radzivil held the pen in his place, and writ a letter full of acrimony and recriminations; a sort of return which the brave inhabitants had no ways merited.

There is one circumstance in his letter extraordinary enough. The people of Riga had represented Gustavus as a prince of unparalleled clemency and generosity, to which Radzivil replies coldly, “ That he was “ not displeas'd to hear that the king of Sweden was a Christian.”

Gustavus then, at the head of a detachment of 14000 men, having first banished the jesuits from Riga, invested Dunamond and took it; in consequence whereof he next made himself master of Mittau †, the capital of Semigallia, and place of residence of the dukes of Courland. This city then subsisted under the title of a beneficiary possession from the republic of Poland, with whose interests the reigning duke then naturally sided on account of his relative situation: and from compassion to these circumstances, Gustavus generously promised to restore the town to him upon the observance of some certain conditions set forth in the body of the truce then to be concluded between himself and Sigismund; which engagement was made good veraciously by the king of Sweden.

* Loccenii Hist. Suec. p. 557.

† Puffendorf says Britau, but a nobleman of Courland assures me there is no such place.

Farther than Mittau he advanced not: for by this time some Polish parties had committed great depredations near Riga. He therefore flew to the assistance of his new subjects, and left general Wrangel in Mittau with a garrison of 2000 men. Upon this a truce ensued between Sweden and Poland, which was to remain in force till the expiration of the ensuing year. 1621.

The entrance of 1622 was rendered uncommonly disagreeable to Gustavus by the death of his brother *, whom he loved extremely: a young prince of clear courage, and remarkable for an uncommon sweetness of temper. But the same year was rendered illustrious in another respect, inasmuch as it gave birth to Charles Gustavus, afterwards Charles X. king of Sweden. 1622.

And now Gustavus began to be perfectly well apprized, that to subsid an army was far more difficult than to conduct the fighting part: for these reasons, returning to Stockholm in the winter, (a slight truce being concluded with Poland, as we observed before, and oaths of allegiance administered to the deputies of Riga) he took care to procure a clear notion of his revenues; adjusted some difficulties then subsisting betwixt Sweden and Denmark; and formed so good an understanding with Christian, that he promised neither to allow the Poles to make levies in his dominions, nor permit their ships to carry provisions through the Sound, nor military stores; and as the duties of the year 1620, upon corn and cattle, did not appear sufficient to carry on the war, Gustavus introduced what was then called an EXCISE, an expression till that time unknown in Sweden: which was defined to be a royal tax levied upon such things chiefly as were eatable and drinkable. The states made some objection to this impost at first, but at length it passed with universal consent. His majesty it is true proposed it only as a temporary expedient, but (however sincere his intention might be) it was never afterwards in his power to take it off: being involved every day in more and more interesting exploits. In a poor country like Sweden, as this was the most advantageous, so it was the most trying contribution that could be de-

Yet the nation had fuch a confidence in the integrity and bravery of their fovereign, that after a few flight murmurs, they fubmitted chearfully: and upon this agreeable compliance Guftavus determined to move the feat of war into Pruffia, partly as lying nearer home, and partly to fecure the Baltic, and preferve it free from depredations and infults.

Yet nothing could compofe the uneafinefs which Guftavus received from the death of his brother, and his mortification upon that occafion was rendered ftill more fenfible, as he had no children by queen Eleonora. Thefe two events contributed to raife Sigifmond's hopes to the higheft degree: for that prince, by the way, was the greateft pretender then in Europe. He had a right to all he could take, and in proportion to his profpects his pretentions always improved, not only in tone of ftyle, but in force of title. His men of law kept pace with the fword, and arofe upon every event with new' proofs and assertions.

1623. Hence it was that Sigifmond the enfuing year, having formed a defign of invading Sweden, made a political progrefs through Poland, and being entertained with great magnificence at Dantzic, took care to confider occasionally the ftate of his marine, and the means and poffibility of transporting an army to the gates of Stockholm. But Guftavus being, as my hiftorian obferveth *, princeps cautus, ad omnes occafiones invigilans ad avertendum fi quod ingruerat periculum, thinking it always the beft policy to commence an invafion, inftead of repelling one, arrived by a fort of magical transportation with a fleet of fixty-fix fhips (of which twenty were large ones) at the mouth of the port of Dantzic. Sigifmond mounted a watch-tower, in order to behold his kinfman in the character of a fea-commander: upon which the land-fortreffes paid him the compliment of a general difcharge of artillery; and to thefe Guftavus replied with all his naval cannon, which by fome was interpreted as a kind of warlike declaration. But his Polish majefly did not chufe to explain the incident according to this fafhion, contenting himfelf to difpatch a perfon in the name of the magiftracy of Dantzic, with orders to reprezent and complain that fuch practices infringed the liberties of the port in time of truce. Guftavus received this deputy with great courtefy, protesting that he was inclined to cultivate a peace more and more, and that he meditated no fresh warlike transactions, except under the justification of a prior læsit. He then asked abundance of familiar questions concerning the king and queen, and charging the representative employed to deliver his compliments to prince Vladislâus, (whom he desired greatly to see) returned contentedly home without causing the least molestation.

Yet time soon convinced the public that Gustavus's presages and precautions were extremely well grounded: for the truth was, Sigismund received his opinions at that juncture concerning Sweden from discontented exiled Swedes, suborned Germans, and Spanish jesuits *, stationed near him by the court of Vienna, (rarely admitting a single Polander into deliberations of this nature) and of course meditated an expedition at the very moment we are now mentioning; and this broke out more distinctly the year ensuing, when he demanded large pecuniary assistances at the assembly of the senators, and requested that the marine might be placed on a new footing, and the land army re-inforced: but the states of the kingdom declined to advance money towards these purposes, and on the contrary prolonged the truce in a manner no ways conformable to their master's inclinations; which gave Gustavus opportunity and leisure to form his future enterprizes upon Livonia and Prussia †.

State-intrigues produced another mismanagement on the part of Sigismund. Most men cast their eyes on Conospoliski as the ablest commander in the crown-service: but as that officer was then employed on the side of Russia, it was thought necessary to give the present command against Gustavus to one Zamoski palatin of Kiow: but Denhoff prefect of Lasci, then all powerful in the cabinet, did not care to admit a representative in Conospoliski's department, lest the kingdom, in case of any notable success, should request to see him continued. And thus the campaign of a second summer was ruined, for Conospoliski arrived not till the month of October ‡.

1623. Mean while the Spaniards wanted greatly to preserve Sigismund in a state of war against Gustavus, and to this purpose his catholic majesty dispatched count de Sobre to him with a magnificent retinue. This nobleman, originally a Flemming, wore the order of the golden fleece, and arrived afterwards to high authority in the court at Madrid. In his instructions Gustavus was styled more than once the supporter of an erroneous religion, and usurper of Sweden. The main purpose of his legation was to obstruct the truce, and administer fuel to a more continued war. To which Sigismund replied very sensibly, That the constitution of Poland was no ways congenial to a state of warfare, and that Spain could assist him only by commanding a powerful fleet to range the Baltic *. But this interruption of a visionary speculation, (for the Castilian slowness and gravity did not duly consider the proposal till five years afterwards) induced him to sue for a fresh cessation of arms that was to hold till June 1625, which favour Gustavus readily granted him; for he formed this opposition merely upon a principle of self-defence, since Sigismund had placed himself at the head of a fleet of transports with a view to make a descent on the Swedish territories. Thus the designs of Poland were rendered abortive, and the town of Dantzic was obliged to make a profession of neutrality.

1623. During this short repose of cessation from hostilities, his majesty found

He founded a fecond univerfity at Abo, and erected fchools in Lapland; and performed an act of like nature fome few months before his death, eftablifhing and endowing the univerfity of Dorpat in Livonia, with a view to cut off all the inconveniences and expences of travelling into Sweden for the fake of an education. And Chriftina his mother conveyed afterwards by her laft teftament 5000 l. towards the perpetual fupport of thirty ftudents at Upfal. Nor was high-admiral Gildenheim, Guftavus's natural-brother, behind the family in point of generofity to learning, for he bequeathed fix little farms for the maintenance of two fcholars of more diftinguifhed genius than the reft of their companions; and what was ftill a further fubject for wonder, his executors for forty years beftowed the benefaction unexceptionably on the moft deferving §. Influenced by thefe examples, the preceptor of Guftavus, who was an excellent claffical fcholar, and well knew the advantages of ftyle and eloquence, endowed a profeforfhip of oratory, and the pupil confirmed it by royal charter. And indeed Guftavus always fhewed the higheft gratitude to this excellent man: for he made him a fenator and chancellor of Upfal, fupreme judge in the kingdom of Gothland, and (though his birth was no ways extraordinary) created him baron Duderhoff, and employed him afterwards in feveral important embaffies.

In a word, the univerfity of Upfal had been quite neglected, and became a fort of defart during the reign of John, Guftavus's uncle, but the donations allowed by the king fufficed to maintain 150 ftudents.

1624. And by the way, it is probable that one of the most remarkable instances of the affection which military men have shewn to learning is to be found in the history of Ireland, where the troops in 1622, (if I can read the date right in my papers) at the conclusion of a very fortunate campaign, made a present of 1800 l. out of their pay to the college of Dublin to purchase books ; and Uther and Chaloner saw the sum faithfully applied. And indeed Gustavus, as far as the hurry and confusion of a martial life would allow him, testified upon all occasions an high regard for learning and men of letters ; giving the public a proof of his excellent taste, by making Grotius's incomparable book de Jure Belli et Pacis (which though mentioned here was not published till the year afterwards) his delight, his study, his information ; nay, he carried his idea of the author so far, that he determined to employ him (whenever business flowed in faster upon him) as a public minister : with which measure Oxenstiern heartily concurred. This project was resumed, when negotiations began to thicken extremely in Germany. But the king's premature death rendered the scheme abortive for that period.

Returning therefore from this digression, I shall continue to inform the reader, that the conditions of the aforesaid treaty turned purely upon one circumstance, which was, that neither party at its expiration should be allowed to declare war without two months notice previous and anterior to the 1st of June 1625 : and this very stipulation, by the mere perversity of accidents, created some misunderstandings in the ensuing year. Many other punctilious difficulties were started and refuted *, inasmuch as all that jus-publicists could devise, and all that a scholastic nation could refine upon, was advanced by Poland : but it may suffice to remark, that the solid strong sense of Oxenstiern soon pierced through these delicate, but thin-spread cobwebs of ingenious subtilty.

Matters stood upon the same footing between the two kings : for the rival of Gustavus was little more or less than a schoolman on the throne. Distinctions without difference made up the half of his policy ; he thought all things lawful that he had the dexterity to obtain, and valued himself more upon artifice, (if he could reach his object) than upon sincerity and

plainness; falsely supposing, that all circumvention and over-reaching implied superior abilities. On the other hand, Gustavus was unreserved and open, generously honest and devoid of dissimulation; and it was his choice (though nature had given him talents to act otherwise, had it so pleased him) to oppose a sort of compendious pointed common sense to theory, eloquence, and sophisticated distinctions; convinced (as hath been observed on a like occasion) that in this and all similar cases, The very gleanings of the grapes of Ephraim are better than the vintage of Abiezer. And indeed, if we examine history ever so carefully, we shall find but few families that have produced at the same time two contenders of such opposite characters as Gustavus and Sigismund, both descended from the house of Vasa, and not less nearly connected one to the other than in the relation of first cousins. Of the two, Sigismund alone must be considered as the person irreconcilable: yet, unfortunately for the prosecution of his resentments, he found perpetual obstacles (partly occasioned by his own misconduct and dissimulation) from that honest but capricious form of government, a Polish diet.

In truth, the good people of Poland had sense enough * (being not a whit inferior to the Italian nation in quickness of parts) to dislike the great abilities of Gustavus in the character of a soldier, since it appeared plainly, during the uniform course of all preceding campaigns, that he overcame them merely by the arts of fortification and the regular conduct of sieges; by a new use of artillery and uncommon precautions in the article of encampments †, possessing in an high degree that great military virtue which Tacitus recommends, non alium ducem OPPORTUNITATES locorum sapientius legisse. On these accounts they languished privately for the intervention of peace; nor were reasons wanting to make an attempt to clog the wheels of war, in order to facilitate that event; for the king had conferred the bishopric of Warmia on prince John Albert his third son then living, who was under the age prescribed by the ecclesiastical laws, being in truth only twelve years old. It was likewise contrary to the constitutions of the realm, to raise a prince of the blood royal to such a station as must place him ex natura officii in public prefectures, and give

But the purchaſe abovementioned was attended with other circumſtances, capable of alarming a nation ſo thoroughly tinged with political jealousy. The diſtrict of Zyweck lay near enough to Cracau to preſcribe laws to it, and the rather, as it confined on Sileſia, Moravia, and Hungary, whoſe inhabitants were of a turbulent and warlike nature, and in proportion more intermeddling with reſpect to Poland, as the major part of them conſiſted of proteſtants very ſincere and extremely jealous. What adminiſtered farther cauſe for ſuſpicion was, it lay very convenient, conformably to reaſons already aſſigned, for enliſting ſoldiers to the detriment of the republic: and contained ſeveral fortiſſes, caſtles, and ſtrong paſſes, with power over which the royal family had no right to be inveſted †. It was objected in the next place, that the current coin of the kingdom was debaſed by counterfeiting, and diminished by abſciſſion; upon which point one of the ſenators obſerved, that this was a grievance that proved afflictive to every individual, and assigned the following state-reason for a prompt redress, Privata acrius urunt, publicorum sensus facilius transmittitur *. 1624.

But the Lithuanian representatives, as if it were by concerted design, refined upon the abuses of the national coin, by observing, that it was not only clipped and adulterated, but reduced to such a scarcity in point of quantity, that hardly enough remained to answer the common demands of subsistence, which scarcity was alledged to result from an ill-conceived and unprosperous war against Gustavus, who to their own knowledge had generosity enough to allow Poland no dishonourable peace, whenever the kingdom thought fit to request it properly; and indeed it was Gustavus's character never to urge an enemy to the last extremity of distress; since if such a person chanced to prove ungrateful afterwards, or unfaithful, he was always conscious from a superiority of parts and valour that he had the power in his hands to reduce him to right reason, or brand him with some mark of condign chastisement.

The obstructions and difficulties already assigned, served to cool that rancour of heart which Sigismund always cherished in opposition to his kinsman, and paved the way to a series of truces, which he signed grudgingly, and observed unfaithfully.

Some other national allegations were likewise produced. It was remarked, that Sigismund had dispatched a large body of Cossacks into Bohemia, and plunged himself abruptly amidst the confusions of the empire, without requesting the concurrence of the states: which precipitate step had given birth to an irruption of the Turks, instigated by the persuasions of Gabriel Bethlem, and made Poland one wide waste of devastation and depopulation.

At length the Lithuanian senators had the boldness to assert, that without assuming to themselves the right of prophecy, they would venture to predict what sort of terms Gustavus would condescend to grant them; (which serves to shew that a great prince performs as much by dint of correspondence as by the point of the sword.) It was observed therefore, that upon supposition all Livonia was restored to him, assignment should be made

A discussion of all these matters being thus premised, there remained still some fresh latent causes of mistrust and disapprobation. A clandestine and criminal correspondence had been discovered, from the import of certain letters intercepted in the Low Countries, whereby hopes had been given (it was supposed from prince Radzivil prefect of Lesser Lithuania) to Gaston duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIII. of succeeding Sigismond in the throne of Poland : upon which the king took the alarm, and denied Radzivil the prefecture of Greater Lithuania, then vacant, to which he had a right both from merit and station : substituting in his room the prince Sapieha, an old man of great authority, approaching to the eightieth year of his age ; rich enough from his own funds to contribute immensely towards the support of a war, but enfeebled as to his capacity, and conversant in civil life more than the military : from whence the consequence was, that Radzivil ever afterwards maintained a good intelligence with Gustavus, and made him an offer of the crown of Poland in 1632.

Upon the whole, the event of this diet proved not unprosperous to the affairs of Sweden ; for the friends of Gustavus had interest enough to check the advance of money necessary for the maintenance of a northern war : which compelled Sigismond, with infinite reluctance, to conclude the truce above-mentioned ; during which interval the Swedish monarch extracted money enough from the province of Livonia to put himself into a capacity of resuming the war with success and vigour. The affair of Zyweck was referred to a future diet : and as to the bishopric of Warmia *, the king was obliged to make provision by diploma, that his son Albert should neither exercise the episcopal function, nor take possession, till he had arrived to the due measure of ecclesiastical age ; submitting likewise to take the oaths of fidelity to the republic, previously to all rights of session and suffrage in the diet: and lastly, all officers and soldiers employed in foreign services, the Imperial service especially, were solemnly recalled, under penalty of being considered and punished in the capacity of fugitives and rebels; which conclusive point was carried against the crown at the very close of the diet, though Sigismund fate himself in the senate-house, and listened to the altercations there till break of day. At this period Gustavus finished the controversy, which still subsisted in a latent manner betwixt him and Denmark from the year 1622, with reference to the imposts of the Sound, and effected it meerly by the dint of an high and unsurmountable spirit. 1624.

Mean while the death of James I. king of England, made no notable variation in the affairs of Gustavus; and here I will spare myself the vanity of exhibiting a laboured delineation of his Britannic majesty's character: such a task being the exercise of a rhetorician, and not the work of an historian: since it is in an author's power, if he hath any skill in historical painting, to place the picture in this or that particular light, and overcharge or diminish the features in meer proportion as fancy shall direct, or prejudice and partiality misguide him. True characters are best collected from a fair narrative of facts: and the reader may make his combination as judiciously, and perhaps less prepossessedly, than the historian; for the very mechanism of writing, helps to make one a party on this side or the other side. The more unprejudiced foreigners (if people are inclined to know their opinions) seem to have had a thorough insight into James's cast of mind and politics; Nani informs us, "That he governed the English and Scots by the machinery of their natural aversions to each other, upon the principles of a private political nostrum, that ease and idleness, in the very nature of things, soften and predispose men's hearts to admit slavery: his first proposals at Vienna might have been listened to, but they were so impracticable and absurd, that the subtil Spaniards soon saw what sort of person they had to deal with, and availed themselves accordingly of his improbabilities and chimeras. They knew likewise that he trembled at war, and abominated a rebellion*." And Le-Barre tells us in

* Istoria di Nani, pag. 138. fol.

Charles succeeded his father in the crown, and to a certain degree in his politics too : though that shall be urged with tenderness and allowances. It is true he formed a league offensive and defensive with the states of the United Provinces, and equipped a large fleet, to which the latter joined a squadron of two and twenty ships. Nevertheless, without expatiating upon these circumstances, it must ever be candidly acknowledged, that James felt some remorse and compunction with respect to the Palatinate in his last days and hours ; and according to the accounts of a veracious and sensible author †, (who writ upon authentic memoirs delivered to him by the injured family in question, which had no great reasons to feel any predispositions to partiality) charged his son, only eight and forty hours before his decease, as he hoped for a parent's benediction, and that of heaven, to exert all his powers in order to re-instate his sister and her children into their hereditary dominions : for, continued he, it was my mistake to seek the Palatinate in Spain ‡. As therefore, in the course of these observations, I have been often severe on that ill-judging king, meerly by relating the strict truth, without ever indulging any petulance of imagination, or acrimony of style, so it is a satisfaction to me to insert this little anecdote, whereby James's character is so far cleared, as he appears to have died a political penitent.

1625. The year 1625 opened with new transactions in the Swedish senate. A vote passed for raising a sort of standing army (De perpetuo milite subsidario) with this reason assigned, that a warlike strength of such a nature might be always ready to obviate the difficulties of unforeseen or fudden events, both in times of war and times of peace; and in order to levy a new fund for this purpose, by way of succedaneum to the other taxes then subsisting, a duty was laid upon all corn that passed the mill, and the impost was intended to favour the poor, who bruised at home by hand the little pittance of grain which was barely necessary for the support of life. But before this edict received its full sanction, the senate and nation agreed to supply the land and naval expences by a voluntary contribution, and superadded a large body of recruits, in order to fill up the necessary deficiencies occasioned by the accidents of war.

The truce being now expired between Sweden and Poland, Gustavus, who sincerely adhered to the good faith of an honest warrior, sent a trumpeter at the time appointed to denounce his intentions, but the severity of the weather rendered it impossible for the messenger to acquit himself of his commission in due season. The Polish ambassadors complained loudly of this neglect, to whom the Swedish ministers replied, That the king their master had been amused beyond all human sufferance, and that he alone could grant with propriety, what they on their own parts could not presume to ask. It was observed further, that the deputies of Poland were not furnished with sufficient powers, and that Sigismund in his instructions of 1624 had implied Gustavus to be an usurper; whereas the latter, on the contrary, had not dropped a single expression that could be deemed oblique; nor were they, the Swedish ambassadors, charged with any one secret article of direction, it being their sovereign's custom to explain fully and publicly every circumstance he proposed to realize. But the Polish representatives still insisted, that a war and a treaty were things incompatible at the same time, and that Gustavus must first disarm, and then negotiate. Upon this Oxenstiern*, who was at the head of the legation, assumed the argument, being exasperated not a little; and told them firmly, there should be no cessation of arms till the preliminaries of the treaty were adjusted; and upon that groundwork he had his master's orders to prolong the truce till August next ensuing, and not a moment further; since otherwise the season of the campaign would be elapsed, and who would indemnify the Swedes for 1625. their expences and fatigues? Observing at the same time, that Livonia was intended to be included in the armistice aforesaid; insisting likewise, that during this cessation it should be allowed the Swedes to draw provisions from Lithuania and Courland, and that Radzivil should approach their camp no nearer than at a distance of ten miles. He then concluded with remarking, that he had the honour to serve a prince who knew how to shoot opportunity on the wing;—That their proposals were only a stale pretext, calculated to protract the time;—That the king his master had the sword drawn;—That he saw his conveniencies, and understood how to use them.—And thus the affair terminated without decision.

Mean while, assisted with such helps as the good natured Swedes had generously contributed, his majesty sailed for Livonia, having a fleet of seventy-six ships under his command; and by the beginning of the month of April made himself master of the castle of Kokenhausen, an important fortress, situated near the banks of the Dwina, rendered strong by art, at the expence of the knights of the Teutonic order, and advantageously protected by nature. He then conquered Selburg, Duneberg, and Nidorp, (not to mention Potnavia which he had taken before) which places were all well supplied with Polish garrisons. Afterwards he mastered Dorpat, which made an imperfect resistance, and surrendered through meer despair of not receiving relief. Thus he reduced all Livonia in a short space, excepting Dunamond, having marched his army backwards and forwards near 700 miles: and as one of the enemy's colonels had formed a design of possessing Riga, either by treachery or surprize, our vigilant monarch intercepted him in the very march, and cut his detachment to pieces. After that, by the dint of good intelligence, he over-reached young Sapieha (who had then some second designs upon Riga) at the head of the Polish army, who lost most of his baggage, and a considerable quantity of artillery: for the youth, prompted by animal impetuosity, sought to give battle at the very moment he ought to have declined fighting; and rushing into a general action with a tumultuous and ferocious sort of bravery, soon fell a sacrifice to a vigilant, composed, and determined opponent. This the very Polish historians rians acknowledge. The king then throwing a bridge over the Dwina, which parts Semigallia and Lithuania, and opening a way to himself into the latter province, took Pofvolia (which harboured a garrison of Cossacks, who greatly harrassed his march) and then Birzen, a fortification of note in those days, where he found sixty or seventy pieces of artillery, one of which was remarkably fine, being embossed and indented on the outside in a manner to resemble cracks and flaws, and bound round with an offensive foliage of iron-work, as if it was intended to render the piece fit for service. In the next place he cast his eyes upon Courland and Semigallia, and made himself master of Mittau, Bousne, and several other important places, partly by force, and partly by stratagem: yet all these successes in war were not sufficient to render him averse to an accommodation; so that it appears at first sight as if it was matter of choice with him, rather to receive laws than impose them: though perhaps there may be another reason assigned, which shall be glanced at hereafter. Therefore to this effect he dispatched Oxenstiern to propose once more a treaty of peace; and Salvius, subdelegate to the chancellor in such like conferences, and Horn, (not Gustavus Horn the general) were sent before or after him as co-adjutors: but the two latter * fell into the hands of the Cossacks, and were interrupted in their political voyage: Oxenstiern, violently exasperated at this infraction of the law of nature and nations, demanded his assistants with a tone of authority by way of preliminary; to which Radzivil the Polish general at length consented. Thus they rejoined the chief of their embassy, but he and they effected nothing. Upon which event a battle ensued on the vast plains of Semigallia †, near a village called Walhoff, about twelve miles from

* Bayle in his history of Gustavus mentions Arnitz, Horn, and Salvius, as three subdelegates; but here he mistakes, for the historian says ARVIDUM, HORNIVM, & IOHANNEM SALVIUM: which last person, whose surname was Adler, born of mean parentage, was first a physician, and next a jus-publicist. He then rambled over all the more enlightened parts of Europe, much in the manner of the ingenious baron Holberg in our days, who after having stayed long in England, undertook a journey on foot from Calais to Italy on the slight foundation of fifty shillings, and there studied many years. But Salvius on his return could not escape the penetration of Oxenstiern, who having strongly recommended him to the king, employed him in all cases of importance, and most particularly at the peace of Munster, being created a senator and baron Orneholm.

1625. from the banks of the Dwina, where it was pretended the Polish cavalry would perform wonders, having full scope and room to act it; but Gustavus soon convinced Sapieha the father*, (a prince not deficient in fine parts, but too old to become a great commander) that he could conduct a pitched battle with the same masterly direction as he entrenched his camp, or besieged a town. And here it may be worth remarking, as we observed before under the siege of Riga, that nothing could be more curious in the military science, than an exact description of this first capital battle which Gustavus engaged in, since it was upon the present occasion that he discovered all at once his inventive talents in the dispositions of the field: but historians, like commentators, usually leave us at the critical stress of doubts and difficulties, which will appear more eminently when we come to examine how the king lost his life in the battle of Lutzen. All we learn with reference to the present engagement is, that Sapieha conducted no inconsiderable army, for he carried with him the flower of the Lithuanian troops, then thought the best in Poland; 400 Cossacks, and 200 cuirassiers; about 900 German infantry, 2000 hussars, and 400 Heyducs. Nor know we more on the other hand, except that Gustavus placed himself in the centre, and gave great proofs of military genius. Count Thurn the father (and not the son, according to the relation of some historians) commanded the right wing, and Gustavus Horn the left, supported by the colonels Plato and Teuffel. The action was sharp, but soon brought to conclusion in favour of the Swedes. Upon which Gustavus, in the very height of this new prosperity, forgot not to make Sigismund a tender of a second peace; for he well knew the tediousness and uncertainty of waging war against a sort of vagabond army, whom it was hard to find, and harder still to fix to a decisive battle.

to have observed in the preceding page) is divided into two provinces, Courland, properly so called, and Semigallia. Courland in the old Curish language, which is a dialect of the Slavonian, signifies a flat land, and Sem galle (Semigallia) imports a land on the other side:

for the word sem is also synonymous to land. Memoirs communicated.

* This prince Sapieha was called Leo; and the son (who had been lately defeated) was named Stanislaus.

Be that as it will, the Poles lost their artillery, their baggage, a good number of standards, relinquishing to the enemy many prisoners, and leaving 1600 dead men on the field of battle. It is asserted by some, that the king of Sweden, previously to this engagement, sent a trumpeter to Sapieha with this short message; That as there were two such things in the world as peace and war, he made him the compliment of choosing that which he preferred most. To which Sapieha replied, "That having only one ambition, his desire was, to make a fair trial with his majesty upon equal ground." Not that Gustavus complied with this request, (which was then the high military mode) upon a principle of gallantry; but foreseeing barely, that as his troops were better than the Polish ones, and his discipline superior, plain ground to him was a sort of advantage. Moreover, it was highly expedient in his circumstances to introduce a battle of the decisive kind; and it may easily be guessed what induced Sapieha to come to action. The Polish armies, it is well known, abound in cavalry, and it was firmly believed in those days, that infantry on flat ground could make no resistance against horse; but the king of Sweden (who first sustained the contrary opinion) conjectured otherwise, and realized his ideas upon that subject more than half a century before the invention of the bayonet, which, when compared with the reformed pike of Gustavus, may be fairly considered as the substitution of a succedaneum, where no succedaneum was really wanted. Mansfelt's troops, it is true, had performed something of this kind a few years before, but that was effected purely by chance, and the meer dint of necessity: nor (though the fact was indisputable) did he, or any military man, draw conclusions from it.

Yet Sigismund still continued inflexible, notwithstanding he perceived his competitor to be great in all things, and felt in the space of a few months the several effects of his extraordinary abilities, not only in a pitched decisive battle, (the event of which had thrown into the hands of the Swedes all the vast duchy of Lithuania, excepting only the town of Dunamond) but in the art of investing fortified towns, and in the very direction and management of a Polish diet. Add to this, that the dis-

1625. positions of Providence, and the wise arrangement of human events, by the artful adjustment of Gustavus, had rendered the military transactions of this year highly unprosperous to Poland. Two national misfortunes helped to co-operate to the same end: the one was a fire which broke out at Jaroslau, one of the most renowned fairs in Europe, next to those which are held at Francfort and Leipzig, and as the houses in Poland are all built of wooden materials, the flames soon consumed the city, and all the rich merchandizes therein contained *. The other circumstance to be lamented was, that the Cossacks thought fit to invade the Chersonese of Tartary, in order to revenge a brother of the Cham, who had been lately dismissed from the Ottoman service: this irruption forced the grand seignior to request that Sigismund would recal his barbarians; which obliged his Polish majesty to send Conospoliski, his best general, to reduce these ferocious invaders to reason. Thus Gustavus, during the spring and summer, obtained a breathing-time of very considerable advantage to him.

And here, having mentioned the Cossacks, it may be matter of curiosity to make a few remarks incidentally upon a race of beings as extraordinary in the military history of those days, as the Pandours and Talpaches are in the present century.

The Cossacks were not properly speaking an original nation †, but a set of irregular soldiers, formed upon their own principles into a community. His Polish majesty appointed them a general, (as was the case with the Croats in the Imperial service) but the inferior officers were elected according to their own regulations. They derive their name from the word coza, which in the language of Poland signifies a goat, alluding to the celerity of their loco-motion, and the depredations they make in the countries round them. It was their custom to winter in the islands of the Nieper, or Borysthenes, called Saporoiæ, in order to be prepared against the irruptions of the Tartars and Turks. In summer they roamed from place to place, supporting themselves partly by hunting, and partly by dried fish, with which the aforesaid river abundantly supplied them ; and towards the approach of the new year, except the roads had been rendered impassable, returned regularly to their cottages, and revisited their wives and children : in all places of their peregrinations and wanderings ever acknowledging themselves subjects to the crown of Poland. In former times they carried a bow, a quiver, and a short sword ; but in the wars we speak of, they supplied themselves with carbines, head-pieces, and breast-plates. Such were the Cossacks properly so called ; nevertheless it must be observed in the course of this history, that the Polish light horsemen in general usually pass under that comprehensive denomination.

Mean while Sigismund their sovereign, astonished with such rapidity of conquest on the part of Gustavus, in order to recover the immense tract of ground that had been lately lost, issued out his monitorials to convene a fresh diet at Warsaw, immediately upon the opening of the ensuing year ; but Gustavus was expeditious enough to outstrip the precautions of his rival, and while Sigismund was racking his imagination with devising ways and means how to extirpate him from the duchy of Lithuania, to the Swedish monarch (though the enterprize at that period remained a secret) was forming a scheme of kindling up a fresh war in the heart of that Prussia which belonged to Poland. About the same time his Britannic majesty made some languid attempts of entering into measures with Gustavus and the king of Denmark, with reference to the restitution of the Palatinate ; but received very cold and unsatisfactory answers from them : since they roundly told him, they had nothing to send him but matter of unintelligible amusement, except he gave them an example by dispatching an English army into Germany.

Buckingham afterwards (in the congress of ambassadors held at the Hague) resumed the point, purely with relation to Sweden, in which some advances were made on either side : but his Swedish majesty, who wanted impatiently to interpose in the empire, and shorten the wings of the Austrian eagle, demanded some conditions incompatible with the interests of the king of Denmark, who was Charles's uncle, and thus the negotiation was rendered abortive. Nevertheless fresh instructions came, tending to compose all differences between the two northern kings, with a

Having mentioned Buckingham in this place, it hath been suggested to me by some people, that he and Gustavus formed a better intelligence betwixt each other a few years afterwards, and that when the duke made his famous expedition against the island of Rhé, doubting much of the prosperity which might attend so extraordinary an enterprize, he conceived a scheme, in case of disappointment, (being then-absolute master of all men's external services that acted under him) of sailing directly, and fixing a settlement by virtue of a commission from Gustavus in some part of the Spanish West-Indies, of which the idea is romantic, but not absolutely improbable. For Buckingham was a visionary man of an imagination unbounded. The foreigners give us a better idea of him than our own historians; he had the presumption in France to talk to queen Anne in the style of a lover: and the marchioness of Sennecy, dame of honour, who placed herself between him and her mistress in order to keep him at a greater distance, said to him with a tone of severity, "Sir, people do not talk thus here to a queen of the realm *."

Bassompierre, in the journal of his own life, gives us another instance of the duke's petulant vivacity: "I had, said he, a long disputative audience with his Britannic majesty, who permitted himself in the course of the debate to be hurried away by the violence of passion, to whom I answered respectfully but firmly, when on a sudden Buckingham moved from that part of the room where he was standing, and planting himself between the king and me, said pertly enough, Je viens faire le kola entre vous deux." I must observe likewise, that Richelieu and he hated each other mortally; the cardinal writ him a letter, where he joined the body of his epistle to the compellation of Monsieur at the beginning, making no space nor distance: and the duke returned him an answer upon the same principle: for which indeed one cannot blame him; for he seems to have remembered something of the same nature which passed between two grandees in Spain; the one writ a letter to the other and subscribed himself at the bottom simply, The Marquis, (implying that this title belonged to him by way of pre-eminence) but the other returned him a signature at the bottom of his letter equally extraordinary, for he signed himself, The other Marquis. 1625.

Nevertheless, in spite of all successes with reference to Poland, Gustavus still demonstrated himself inclinable to peace. He did not relish a long unprofitable war, which administered no adequate gratification to his ambition: and as he pitied his subjects with the tenderness of an affectionate parent, chose not to emburthen them with extraordinary expences, except profit and glory could make them ample amends for the generosity of their contributions: and as he perceived Sigismund, on the footing things then stood, determined to omit no occasions of distressing him, in case he embarked in another war, and found therein the slightest check; he therefore ardently desired to introduce a solid peace, or an inviolable truce: both which he had a right and power to prescribe to his adversary; but perceiving Sigismund to be a man whom he could neither restrain, amuse, or satisfy, he at length resolved to put one favourite scheme into execution with a very high hand, (the FELICITER AUDET being his military and political motto) and this was nothing more nor less than to produce a war nearer home on a new theatre of action. When therefore it was concluded naturally by the Polanders, he (being now at Stockholm) would make a second irruption into Lithuania, all on a sudden, to the surprize of Europe in general (before the common season of opening a campaign) it being only the month of February, having already contented himself with the conquest of Livonia * or Lifeland, embarked an army of 26000 men in 150 ships †, and steered his course into the harbour of Pillau, which town was then garrisoned by the troops of the elector of Brandenburg, as duke of Prussia; but the governor (whom some suppose to be pre-engaged by a proper application of money ‡) had more probably private instructions to relinquish the place without reluctance to the possession of the Swedes, firing only a few pieces of artillery unladen with balls: for Sigismund, 1626. some days before, had predicted the invasion of Gustavus to the states of Ducal Prussia and the elector of Brandenburg: (requesting the latter to consider himself as a possessor only by beneficiary right from the crown of Poland) and had sent inspectors to examine thoroughly the harbour in question, who all returned him solemn asseverations, that every thing appeared to be in a state of absolute safety, which created afterwards no small suspicions in the royal mind ||. Nor must we, on the other hand, forget that Gustavus had previously tendered a neutrality to the elector, his brother-in-law, which he accepted with thankfulness, and by way of return made him an offer of the town and harbour, both as a security in case of retreat, and as the means whereby to collect either contributions or purchasable supplies from the city of Dantzic, the first of all the Hanse-towns, and usually stiled the granary of the north: where great things were dreaded from this astonishing invasion of Prussia, since a grave and pious historian * assures us, that the inhabitants had beheld two armies embattled in the air, and that reciprocal discharges of thunder and lightening had performed the effects of artillery.

Pillau, thus circumstanced, (especially if the castle be included, which surrendered likewise) was a strong place of great importance, situated near the island of Nerunga, on the coast of the Baltic, and distant from Koningsberg (a town then celebrated for its wealth and traffic) about twenty miles. A little frith conducts you from Pillau into the lake of Frischau, which extends itself from Koningsberg westward to the mouth of the Vistula; a breadth which measures little less than threescore miles. In this quiet water Gustavus refreshed his troops some days, and then disembarked them at the very point where the river Passenge, or as some call it Passeria, disembogues itself into the aforesaid lake. And here it may be worth while just to inform the reader, that Prussia (which belonged originally to the knights of the Teutonic order, who in process of time fell a sacrifice to their insolence, luxury, and corruption of manners) was divided into two parts, one belonging to the king of Poland, and one appertaining to the elector of Brandenburg. The former of these princes possessed Dantzic, and all that lies eastward on the banks of the Vistula to a certain breadth: in which tract may be reckoned many towns of great consequence, as Thurn, Marienberg, and Culm, (formerly the metropolis of the district) as also Elbingen, the most flourishing and beautiful of them all; and the latter of these princes enjoyed a territory which borders to the north on the Baltic ocean, the Curish lake, and the edge of Courland; confined eastwards by Samogitia and part of Lithuania; having the palatinate of Massoria to the southwards, and Royal Prussia on the western side*.

Gustavus, who had but one principal of action whenever he entered a conquered or neutral country, comported himself in the elector's dominions with all imaginable moderation, equity, and humanity, and so much the rather, as the terms agreed upon between them were perfectly well comprehended on either side: passing therefore all electoral towns without animadverting upon them, and pointing the course of his army to the south-west, his first step, in order to dismay the enemy, was laying a tax of 30 per cent. on the navigation of Dantzic. After that he took Braunsberg and Frawenberg, (which Pillau in effect commanded) transferring the collegiate and town-libraries of the former place to the university of Upsal, which in truth was more matter of show than real utility; being intended as a secret reproof to the friends of the house of Austria, inasmuch as Tilly had some years before, by the connivance of that court, transported very nearly the whole Palatin collection from Heidelberg into the Vatican: concerning which unfortunate siege, the Heidelbergers to this moment talk of the incredible resistance made by the English, for it was more a carnage than military engagement on both sides. Every thing was plundered indiscriminately from the palace to the artificer's shed: nor did those learned treasures escape, which till that time were esteemed the glory of the protestant parts of Europe. This library stood in the church of the Holy Ghost: most of which Tilly by the emperor's orders conveyed to Italy, and a small dividend was sent to Munich. The Croats, whether they could read or not, secured some few books, which were sold to the learned and curious bit

* Piafecchii Chronica, in annum 1629;

1526. by bit, so that one may see morsels of this illustrious collection, not only in various libraries, (besides the Vatican and at Munich) but dispersedly amongst private hands all over Europe. Amongst other valuable MSS. there were some pieces that the Romanists were extremely glad to secure from public view: such, for example, was St. Chrysostom's epistle to Cefarius, which opposeth the doctrine of transubstantiation; and many more of a like stamp. Nor can a protestant till this hour, though ever so well received by the cardinals at Rome, (who to do them justice are remarkable courteous to men of letters) procure any free and undisturbed access to several MSS. that once belonged to the Heidelberg collection.

The elector of Bavaria, who was a prince of great acquired as well as natural parts, had a violent desire to transport this inestimable treasure to his own palace; and if he had, Gustavus might have given the palatin a fresh investiture into his old possessions in 1632; but the pope had a fancy to make himself master of so extraordinary an acquisition: and his request did not well admit of a contravention; for by the way he was the first mover of transferring the Palatinate to the house of Bavaria, and the court of Munich besides had a new game to play at Rome, for Gregory XV. (formerly cardinal Ludovico) died soon after this period, and Urban VIII. succeeded him, who well deserved to be courted on account of his great spirit, as well as excellent understanding. He had been deputed nuntio by Clement VIII. into France, and had held Louis XIII. at the baptismal font. Nor was he over-much prepossessed in behalf of the interests of the Spanish faction, with which Bavaria then co-operated. For a thesis had been published immediately on his election, with this title, Num Papa esset Catholicus? To which Pasquin by the direction of the party replied, Tace, tace—Est Christianissimus *. Matters therefore being in this posture, the books were divided; and as a Greek named Leon, librarian of the Vatican, crossed the Alps on the occasion, he made no unfavourable division, as to quantity and quality, in behalf of his master, when a partition-treaty of manuscript-learning came to be settled between him and one of Tilly's commissary-generals.

* Arcana Dominat. Hispan. p. 15.

But to return from this short digression: the king banished the whole race of jesuits from Frawenberg, as he had done formerly at Riga, not meerly as Roman catholics, but as public incendiaries both in war and politics: and it will appear hereafter how sincerely earnest they were to be revenged of him, and how capable they demonstrated themselves of returning him a countervailing equivalent at no inconsiderable distance of time. He then took Ravensberg by composition, with the smallest loss that can be well conceived; for a sudden panic had possessed the garrison.

Some days afterwards he invested Elbingen *, where the defendants were almost equal in number to those that assailed them. And here the king gave a fresh proof, both of his good nature and contempt of danger; for whilst the commander and burgomaster were signing a capitulation in the royal tent, he walked up to the town-gates, and desired to be admitted within the walls upon courteous terms. He then asked pardon of the inhabitants for not making his appearance in a better suit of apparel, and conveying himself from the crowd, in the midst of their admiration, stepped unnoticed into a bookseller's shop, and desired the honest man to supply him with an edition of Buchanan's poems †. And here perhaps, for the remark is proper to be made under any article of this or a similar nature, the public in general may be apt to blame me, for mentioning such little incidents in respect to the life of a person truly great: but I appeal to every man's heart, whenever he respects the character on any one, whether he is not more pleased with the recital of little circumstances unknown, than with a pompous repetition of shining actions which have already presented themselves within the reach of his knowledge? Illustrious persons are not ill comprehended from minute, common, and unguarded transactions; and if the public can ever bear the recital of particularities, it will receive them complacently in the account of a man, the very copying of whose picture afforded daily bread to half the portrait-painters who then flourished in Europe.

1626. By the acquisition of Elbingen, to whose governor Gustavus gave as good terms as the Romans granted Antiochus king of Syria on a like occasion, he fulfilled what the continuator of Foresti observeth sensibly concerning him, namely, that though he had rarely more than an army of 12000 men in Poland, yet he engaged successfully several Polish generals at the head of great bodies of forces in the same campaign, took the strong and important city of Elbingen, and ruined afterwards two Imperial detachments, which amounted at least to 16000 soldiers: obtaining, by the possession of the last named town, all that a warrior in such circumstances could desire; for he procured money, refreshments, and a vast quantity of military stores. At the same time an infinite number of recruits (many of them soldiers of fortune, and Scotsmen) flocked to him from Ducal Prussia; so that he completed all his regiments to their competent quantity*, and was enabled in three days to march to Marienberg, being the seat of the knights of the Teutonic order, into which city one Penclau, a commander in the Polish service, had conveyed with great dexterity a re-inforcement of 200 men, whom he was marching casually into Lithuania. But as the garrison was still deficient and incomplete, he undertook only the defence of the castle, and soon changed even that resolution upon a night's reflection. Not that it is certain whether he feared an assault from the Swedish army, or whether he dreaded the un-soldierlike examen of a barbarian court-martial, inasmuch as he had undertaken to defend a fortress without orders: for the Polish service in those days was full as punctilious as that of the Spaniards. But be those things as they will, having the honour to be invited by Gustavus to supper, he frankly surrendered both town and castle during the course of the repast, leaving in the hands of the Swedes a Polish receiver-general, with his provincial chest, by way of security. Fortunately at the same time count Thurn joined his master with a considerable body of cavalry, having left Livonia, and made a very prudent march through Ducal Prussia.

Thus reinforced the king took Stum, Christburg, Vormitz, and Brodnick, and formed a lodgment in the two islands of Verder, which are furrounded by the Vistula and the river Nagoth: to which the natural remissness of the Poles, and the dissensions that subsisted between their generals, not a little contributed. But in truth the great matter was, that Gustavus was infinitely their superior, not only in pitched battles, and the art of investing towns, but in the method of intrenching his army, and erecting fortifications almost in an instant; so that it was next to impossible to force him into an engagement, except he chose to embrace the opportunity. He then, to open a free passage between Sweden and his army, blocked up the mouth of the Vistula in the narrowest part, and with great presence of mind prevented an attempt of the Polanders to burn his ships, by reasoning rightly from the accidental discharge of a single musquet. (This stratagem, if we substitute fascines in the room of turfs, was precisely the same with that which had been practised against Breda.) He then rendered himself master both of Mew and Dirschau, two strong towns situated on the banks of the Vistula, having thrown a bridge over that rapid and wide-extended river. And here the greatness of his parts appeared very conspicuous, for by pre-occupying these places, it was his purpose to preclude Sigismond from interrupting the important siege which he proposed afterwards to lay to Dantzic: but matters were not then ripe for so important an event. Marching therefore with one Brahé*, an officer of twenty-four years of age, at the head of some cornecies of Smalandian horse, he drove the Poles from Gluckstadt, and seized all their baggage: contenting himself, at the present juncture, to send to the Dantzickers (as he approached their city) certain terms of hard digestion, of which the principal were to this purpose: That all ships should pay him a certain impost: that the town should enter into a strict and unreserved neutrality: that his commissaries should be allowed to purchase corn for ready money; and that the Polish vessels then lying in the harbour should be dismissed; to all which propositions, the last only excepted, the inhabitants consented with outward complacency it is true, but with an inward

1626. duplicity. Nevertheless, in a short time he made himself master of the whole Polish Prussia; for upon this occasion some successful circumstances contrived to correspond with great abilities. On the one hand Sigismund was absent, and violent personal animosities subsisted betwixt his commanders. On the other hand, Gustavus was not only a generalissimo without a rival, but proveditor of the army, mestre de camp, engineer, explorer of passages, and common soldier. He had vigilance to foresee, activity to examine, and courage to execute whatever appeared to come within the reach of human attainment. Which seems to correspond with what Sir Thomas Roe the English ambassador pronounced concerning him about three years afterwards; "That he was a prince who had well considered si violandum est jus: a most temperate and courageous commander, that doeth all offices both of a soldier and counsellor: *Vir ad magnas res, & revolutiones natus". It may be observed further, that his troops were well clothed, well paid, and well subsisted. He allowed of no licentiousness, plunder, cruelty, debauchery, or immorality; and by his example, joined to an exact distribution of countenance and censure, rewards and punishments, made his officers and soldiers as like himself as circumstances could admit.

Nor may it be amiss to observe afresh in this place, that what passed between Gustavus and the Dantzickers, appears to be only on their side meer matter of cajolement and trial of skill: for they sent deputies to him just to rebate the edge of his keenness, and protract the time till Sigismund should approach, whom they favoured privately. In effect that monarch arrived soon at the head of 30000 men in the neighbourhood of Graudrentz, and then the Dantzickers took off the mask, and committed some hostilities on the Swedes, who afterwards treated them as they justly merited.

Sigismund, after some fruitless attempts, in one of which he lost 4000 men near Marienberg, laid siege to Mew, a small town in Pomorrelia, near the influx of the river Versa into the Vistula, and entrenched the main part of his army on a steep eminence, by which the Swedes must necessarily pass; for as he foresaw they would attempt to raise the siege, he wanted to bring them to a sort of general engagement, which in his judgment, conformably to the nature of the ground, had all human appearances of proving favourable to himself. Gustavus drew near, and examined the approaches with uncommon attention, but fore-saw great inconveniencies from the furious sweep of two batteries, which the enemy took care to erect, having some previous notice of the attack. 1626.

It was indispensably necessary for the service of the campaign, either to raise the siege, or throw relief into the town; (for on Mew and Dirschau depended the hopes of possessing Dantzic;) but nothing less than a compleat victory could effect the first, and a certain superiority, like that of a battle something more than half-decisive, was alone capable of producing the second. That sharp service was to be performed, every soldier well comprehended; how to effect it like men of honour was the remaining difficulty. And here it was the rare felicity of Gustavus to be puzzled, but not dismayed; to lose his conjectures, but not his reason; for his mind, on these occasions, gave certain flashes of lightning, produced by the meer collision of necessities. Having marched therefore from his camp at Dirschau, at the head of 3000 chosen infantry, and 500 horse, without drums, and without trumpets, in hopes of beating up one of the enemy's quarters, so far at least as to throw relief into the town, he determined abruptly, in one of these military irradiations, to ascend the hill, pursuing the track of a small winding by-path; nevertheless, at the same time, he found the enterprize so dangerous, that he thought himself obliged, conformably to the custom of the age upon peculiar occasions, to animate his soldiers by a short speech. The brave young Thurn, seconded by colonel Hepburn, a Scots officer of great abilities, and of approved courage, conducted the attack.

If the reader can represent to himself the behaviour of a body of English sailors, commanded to climb a very desperate hill, he may then form some idea of that alacrity of ascending, which, at this time, animated the Swedish soldiers; and as the slopes of the acclivity were garnished 1626. nished with trees, these trees served the assailants for masts and cordage whereby to mount.

When Thurn and Hepburn had gained the summit, which lay near the banks of the Vistula, they found the Polish soldiers entrenching themselves, like good pioneers, and fell on them with incredible fury. But as the Poles poured in fresh troops every moment, the fight was maintained for two hours with incredible obstinacy. Upon which Thurn, finding the service to be extremely dangerous, retired a few paces to a post which had appeared to him more defensible. The Polanders attacked him in making this movement with redoubled fury, being re-inforced by a large body of Heyducks and Cossacks, crying out aloud, "That the Swedish curs could not bear the bite of the Polish "wolves;" but the gallant Bohemian soon convinced them, that a short retreat was something very different from a determined flight. During this interval, Gustavus threw a supply of men and ammunition into the town. And here once more it appeared, that infantry were able to resist an equal or superior body of cavalry: for the fire of Thurn's soldiers was irresistible, and the pikemen stood immovable, like a wall of brass. Upon this footing the action subsided, of which the success was whimsical and capricious; for though the Polanders kept the field of battle, they abandoned the siege. Thus the turn of the scale inclined rather to Gustavus's side: for he carried his point, and his opponents lost theirs. Sigismund was not present in this contest, but prince Vladislavus his son behaved extremely well; the action lasted two days*. There were some other circumstances uncommonly remarkable in the present engagement: for at a just average, every Swede killed a man, losing only one seventh of their own number. The English colonel Mostyn, and a count Brahe (not the young man we mentioned before) performed particular services that day. The former stood firm at the head of 200 German arquebusiers, and resisted every impression the enemy could make. And the latter, by the king's command, had ventured up the hill by another track, attended only with a small party of infantry, and supported there the fire of the Polanders till he had made himself master of the ground, and conveyed the intelligence to his royal master. 1626.

The Poles were so terrified with this desperate resolution of the Swedes, that without further ceremony they raised the siege, though attacked only by an handful of men. This conduct of theirs, as it is commonly delivered down to us in history, seems to me remarkably mysterious; but in truth the matter was, the Polish generals disagreed among themselves; they knew likewise that Gustavus would immediately cause the larger part of his army to join him (being then at a small distance from him): and in the third place, the Polish camp was ill supplied with powder.

Gustavus entered the town that evening, extolling the fidelity of the inhabitants, and bravery of the garrison, to the highest degree, and allowing no man's good services to pass by unrewarded. At night, when all the officers assembled to prayers in his lodgings, (as was not unfrequent) with a view particularly to return thanks for their master's delivery that day, (for his great escapes were manifest) Botvid, his majesty's first chaplain, who had retired to his devotions apart from the army during the whole of the action, made him his congratulations after the service was concluded: to whom Gustavus gave this pious and elegant answer; That he little doubted the prosperity of the battle, when Moses assisted him with his prayers on the mount *.

In the hurry and confusion of this conflict, Gustavus fell twice into the enemy's hands. How he escaped the first time cannot well be ascertained; but be that as it will, he was extricated a second time by the admirable presence of mind of a Swedish horseman, who (to conceal his majesty's quality) cried aloud to the Polanders, "Have a care of yourselves, for we will rescue my brother;" since, by the way, it must be noted, that he had three or four companions at his elbow. This task he performed in an instant: when, not long afterwards, Gustavus perceived his deliverer to be made a prisoner in his turn: and putting himself at the head of five or six cavaliers, brought him

1626. off triumphantly. Now, says he, brother soldier, we are upon equal terms ; for the obligation is become reciprocal *.

Mean while Sigismond made some slight indications of listening to a treaty. Place and time being named, the ambassadors met, and it was the most unmeaning and solemn interview that ever was known : for every man affected the gravity, wisdom, ceremony, and taciturnity of a Spaniard. At length a Polish nobleman of spirit, provoked beyond the measure of patience with these serious grimaces, broke the silence, and proposed terms, which Oxenstiern and the others positively rejected. And indeed this expedient of Zamoski's †, (for such was the proposer's name) if one may judge of the piece from the sample, carries with it a very extraordinary appearance, and may serve to demonstrate (at least collaterally) what an high idea he, and his brother-deputies, had conceived of our king's generosity and greatness of spirit : For the tenor of it ran to the following effect, " That " the Swedes should cede Livonia to Poland, and Sigismond on his " side should resign to Gustavus Esthonia and Finland : " (to which latter principality he had a more immediate claim, inasmuch as it was a part of his father's appennage ;) " and in case Gustavus died without " issue-male," (his only brother being dead about four years before)
 " that then one of Sigismond's sons should be declared successor to the " crown of Sweden, and Sigismond himself assume the title as to ex" ternal form ; the next relation of Gustavus being to be invested
 " with the duchy of Sudermania in perpetuum."

Now it is Puffendorf's opinion, that this proposal came from the Swedes ‡, which appears to me highly unnatural ; and so much the rather, as a more enlightened author informs us, that the conditions, alike unjust and unworthy ||, were first devised by the Polanders ; nor can the baron's exactness (any more than his impartiality) be always relied on : for he tells us in the same paragraph, that prince Charles,

the king's brother, died the preceding year (1625): whereas the event of his decease happened four years before, in 1622. 1626.

As this proposed accommodation had the air of being erected upon meer extravagancies, of course the war commenced afresh: and Conopoliski, the ablest general amongst the Poles, formed an enterprize against Dirfchau, but retired with loss and disappointment; for Gustavus had prudently thrown troops into the town before he could possibly approach it. Sigismond made like attempts upon Mew and Marienberg, with the same ill success. Thus the campaign concluded neither unprosperously nor ingloriously for the Swedish cause. For the king, whose troops began to be extremely harrassed through the extensiveness of his conquests from April to October, encamped himself with great judgment on the approach of winter; having all Prussia at his devotion behind him, and the navigation of the Vistula open betwixt himself and Sweden; and thus he bade defiance to the united efforts of Sigismond, Conopoliski, and Sapieha.

Towards the expiration * of this year, Gustavus was rendered happy by the birth of a second daughter, called Christina; the former named likewise Christina (or as some say Christiana) being dead for some time. Upon this new event, Sigismond (which is not uncommon to minds endued with perseverance and obstinacy) grew more and more encroaching, proud, and intermeddling every day: upon which the Swedish senate, fully determined to mortify his vanity and check his ambition and turbulence all at once, thought proper to settle the succession on Christina, and declared her heiress to the throne.

It hath been the misfortune of this unaccountable woman to have been more spoken of in history and memoirs, than one half of her female cotemporaries. It is afflictive above measure to consider such a daughter in the light of being descended from such a man. She has claim at least to a certain degree of oblivion ; and one must say of her with the great Oxenstiern on a like occasion (who when he pronounced the words could hardly refrain from tears), Alas, alas, be things as they will, nevertheless she is the daughter of the GREAT GUSTAVUS !
1627. Matters continuing still upon a disagreeable footing in respect to Poland, Gustavus took care, like a prudent and condescending prince, to lay before the senate all the efforts, advances, and concessions he had made, in order to procure a lasting peace. These papers being thoroughly perused, the states took flame in an instant, and being charmed on the one hand with their master's sincerity and communicative temper, and exasperated beyond all imagination on the other hand at the rejection of such reasonable conditions as he had vouchsafed to propose, determined once for all to mortify the pride of Sigismond, and cut off his pretensions even from the very root. In a word, they reposed a confidence so unlimited in their sovereign, that they made him a tender of new supplies of money, and determined to serve under him in their proper persons, if there should be occasion. And indeed great national actions can never be effected, except the king and his people preserve a mutual confidence and esteem for each other : for it was in the power of the latter to have checked the operations of the war at any time, either through peevishness or capriciousness. After such evidences of unreserved frankness and sincerity, his majesty began to feel he had fixed his footing on firm ground ; and therefore with an eye to popularity, and in hopes of conciliating shears, till she reduced them to the size of the sides of rooms, or the compartments of stucco-work and wainscoting, where she intended to place them : little considering, that when the superficial extent of a picture is diminished by cutting, that the proportions which remain are greatly injured, if not totally ruined. the affections of his subjects to him more and more, he besought the states to examine carefully a plan that had been laid before him for establishing a commerce to the West-Indies. From which undertaking he proposed to give his nation a new turn for maritime affairs, and elicit no small advantage from an intercourse which had proved not unprofitable to his European neighbours, alledging likewise (which in him was certainly matter of sincerity) the singular advantages of spreading the sacred truths of the Gospel over those uncultivated and unlightened regions. On the same religious principles he ventured on a bolder and more noble step nearer home, and at this important juncture re-published and enforced an edict in favour of distressed and oppressed protestants in all countries, offering these emigrants a safe retreat in Sweden, together with a periodical immunity from all taxes*; and what is still more nobly disinterested, full permission to return whenever the troubles of Europe should be composed. And here, besides preserving a sincere and generous sense of piety at bottom, his majesty had certainly an eye to the extravagant power and cruelty of the house of Austria, and opened a sanctuary to a million of people, who, after the loss of all their worldly goods and possessions, were deprived of their civil and religious liberties: so that we may denominate this measure one of those fortunate actions in a prince which at the same time is wise and good: and as Gustavus had something of the singular and inventive cast in all he did, he may be considered, except we suppose him to copy the conduct of queen Elizabeth on the like occasion, to be the father of the refugees, and the protector of exiles. In this circumstance likewise he has been imitated by One, who by copying the actions of Gustavus, pays a silent but speaking tribute of honour to the memory of the deceased.

It is not to be described how much all these new schemes at Stockholm delighted the senators; and that particularly which related to establishing a settlement in the West-Indies; to which all people subscribed generously and promptly, in conformity to the example the king had set them. One Ussing, a Fleming, two years before, first 1627. made this proposal to Gustavus, who readily complied with it both from religious and political reasons ; inasmuch as in the latter case he proposed, by introducing commerce, to lessen the taxes that affected agriculture, casting likewise a small collateral glance at the king of Spain, who extracted, as he thought, rather too much money from the American regions, which tended chiefly to aggrandize himself and the Imperialists likewise. But his majesty, greatly interrupted by affairs nearer home, had not power to give laws to two worlds at once : and the Spaniards, with a view to support the Polish or Imperial interests, (for no reason was assigned) contrived, dexterously enough, to make themselves masters of the little Swedish squadron in the act of pursuing its voyage to the department assigned. Nevertheless the disappointment was far greater than the real loss ; for this first equipment was only a sort of feeling the pulse, in order to judge how far such a kind of expedition might answer hereafter : so that the subscribing subjects, and the nation in general, bore their losses patiently enough, and the sums of money that remained were appropriated to the uses of the war, and other services of state.

Whilst Gustavus employed himself with great attention at Stockholm, (where by consent of senate, making a draught of one man out of ten throughout his dominions, he formed a body of 40000 fine recruits in case of emergency *) Conospoliski, notwithstanding the extreme severity of the season, changed the siege of Dantzic into a blockade, taking care at the same time that the little Swedish army, which Gustavus left behind him, should make no incursions into the unconquered parts of Poland, having rendered himself master of the port of Buca, from whence, and from the harbour of Pillau, the Swedes in effect invested Dantzic. Mean while Gustavus suffered no small uneasiness, as the tempests of the ocean and the inclemency of the season would not allow him to transport a large re-inforcement to his army. But what contributed most to agitate and chagrin him was, that the Poles had re-possessed the city of Putzka, which gives laws to a small territory of the same name ; and that the colonels Strief and Teüffel * (both men of service, the one having commanded the right wing of cavalry at the battle of Prague †, and the other being an officer whom Gustavus particularly esteemed) had the misfortune to be over-reached by the vigilance of Conospoliski, at a time they supposed him at least sixty miles removed from them. They had 8000 new-raised troops under their command, all levied during the preceding winter, in and near the territories of Brandenburg. As the men were unpractised, and unexperienced, it was not easy for their commanders to raise them to the height of a spirited resistance ; for when Sigismond's general had surrounded them on every side, and the Polish horse begun the attack, these military novices advanced, their hats upon their pikes, without deliberation, and asked for quarter. Of course Strief and Teüffel were taken prisoners, and the common men were dismissed to Germany, under promise of honour not to serve against the kingdom of Poland for one year then next ensuing. Behold here the only real disgrace that ever arrived to a large body of troops under the pay of Gustavus ; and still it must be considered in the second place, that the men were all infants in the practice of war, and their master likewise was absent. His majesty, when the event had happened, made no remonstrances nor complaints, (it being his custom to be angry only whilst matters continued undecided) yet never meeting with the name of Strief in the future course of our history, it seems probable to me that the king dismissed him. Teüffel he knew to be brave and able, (and allowing the best officers to be circumvented or beaten once or twice in the apprenticeship of their trade) he continued his favours to him, and rather increased them.

Conospoliski thought it now high time to refresh his men ; but Gustavus arrived with the first fair wind in the month of May, and forced him to resume the duties of the field with great reluctance. Indeed it was our hero's custom to anticipate the approach of spring in opening a campaign, but the tempestuousness of the season prevented 1627. his embarkation till the time mentioned, and then he made his appearance in Prussia at the head of a brave and well-disciplined army, opening the campaign with uncommon lustre, and gaining two very notable advantages in one day; for he took the fort of Kefmark by assault, and defeated a large detachment of Polish troops which marched to its relief. He then applied himself to the siege of Marienberg, a strong fortress built by the Dantzickers in order to free them from the insults of the Swedish fleet, and soon reduced it, though it was well supplied with provisions and military stores, and doubly garrisoned. The Poles however pursued the war with surprizing perseverance, and had briskness enough to attack Gustavus's camp, which occasioned a second action at Dirschau; where the enemy's infantry had been entirely broken and ruined by the Swedish cavalry, if a large body of Polish horse had not made a motion instantly to their support. The assailants however, notwithstanding their superiority of numbers, were at length repulsed, and happy for them they escaped on so good terms; for whilst Gustavus was surveying, from an eminence, the nature of the ground, both with respect to himself and the enemy, upon some notable alteration in the turn of the battle, he had the misfortune to be struck by a falcon-shot near his elbow, which disconcerted his generals and his soldiers to a supreme degree. On this occasion all the chief officers of the army, with the respectable Oxenstiern at their head, besought him, on the approach of evening, in the tenderest manner, to manage his life with more care, as he passionately loved his subjects, and was beloved by them with reciprocal affection. Convinced of their attachment to him, he told them with emotion, modestly, and at the same time a certain degree of firmness: "That the Divine Power would continue just the same, when he was gone; nor did he suppose himself so indispensably necessary to the conservation of his kingdom as they, from a kind prepossession in his favour, were inclined to imagine: Since, said he, if the Supreme Being should be pleased to dispose of me in the day of battle, he will questionless raise up some abler support to the crown of Sweden. But, continued he, if that self-same Being hath committed this important charge to me, it is my business to perform it without any views of favouring myself ; and if death be my portion in the event of war, how can a king die more gloriously than in the justification of his people ? 1627.

—It appeared afterwards from Gustavus's future practice and turn of mind, that the remonstrance had less effect than the reply †.

But when his majesty's physician approached him, who thought a man of his importance must say something to strengthen the request of the prime-minister Oxenstiern and the generals, the king, with a smile, replied to him : Doctor, pray make the conversation concise, and call to mind the good old Latin proverb, Ne sutor ultra crepidam ‡. From whence it is manifest that he bore all his pains with composure of mind and gaiety ; since, on another occasion, when the surgeon was puzzling himself to extract a musket-ball, Gustavus (remembering doubtless a saying of Alexander the Great on a like occasion) besought the artist to allow the ball to continue in his body, as an illustrious monument that he had not passed his youth in idleness and inactivity *.

But what afflicted Gustavus more than the wound was the news he received, that Adolphus, duke of Holstein, had marched a body of Imperial troops in order to conjoin himself with Sigismund. This general, ever distinguished for giving marks of the clearest courage, laboured under two very signal misfortunes ; his powers to act were greatly circumscribed ; nor had his troops over-much opinion of his parts, or uncommon confidence in his military conduct, if we except only the fighting part. Yet, in spite of the arrival of these veteran bands, the king was obliged to go to Stockholm, in hopes to recover his health, much impaired by the wound he had lately received ; and in the interval left the command of his army to count Thurn, who chose to give the men rest rather than action ; nevertheless, upon relinquishing a castle which the Polanders immediately seized, he contrived, having left a concealed mine beneath it, to blow up a considerable number of enemies, together with the whole fortification.

Thus concluded the campaign of 1627, and Gustavus by this time had obtained so great a character as a man of consequence, that even his Britannic majesty humbly entreated his friendship, and sent him

And here we naturally terminate the transactions of the year 1627, where we may just transiently observe, having made mention of Charles I, that England, France, and Spain, were governed at this period by three youths, who had Buckingham, Richelieu, and Olivarez, for their prime ministers.

1628. Nor was Gustavus unactive during his residence at Stockholm, admonishing by edict *, under pain of confiscation of ships and cargo, all commercial persons in the Hanse-towns to abstain from conveying provisions and military supplies of any sort to the inhabitants of Dantzic, whom he considered in the light of declared enemies, inasmuch as they publicly infested the ocean, and did great harm both to his subjects and allies. Nevertheless, that he might not preclude all hopes of an accommodation, he artfully allowed them at the same time a free intercourse of commerce with foreign countries, excepting in such instances as fell within the article of warlike stores and assistances; upon this condition, that they paid a certain impost to the royal fleet of Sweden, which then blockaded the harbour. Nor were these measures on either hand ill conceived with respect to Dantzic, as that town was a thorn of uneasiness which his majesty could not eradicate, except with dexterity.

Matters being placed upon this footing, (the spring of the year as yet but just commencing) Gustavus re-embarked from Stockholm in a fleet of three and thirty sail, and lighting upon seven Dantzic ships between that town and the fort of Weiffelmond, took three, sunk a fourth, and gave chase to the remainder. One refuged itself in the port of Colbergen, but the Swedes demanded it from the inhabitants, who being subjects to the elector of Brandenburg resigned it, as is supposed not unwillingly, though a certain face of appearances was preserved. His majesty's squadron was not so fortunate a few days after, for lighting by chance on five Polish ships (one of which was laden with stores) the commanders of them behaved so well, that they forced their way through the Swedish fleet. About the same time a detachment from the main 1628. army attempted to storm some of the outworks of Dantzic, but were repulsed with loss, several captains being taken prisoners, and count Thurn wounded; during which operations the Polanders with very inconsiderable loss made themselves masters of Pautzken and Mew. Stung to the quick with these slight disgraces, his majesty broke up from his camp of Dirschau, at the head of a detachment of 7000 men, and having made a concealed march over morasses deemed impassable, possessed himself by dint of industry, dexterity, and stratagem, of the lesser island near Dantzic; for he passed the river over three flying bridges, conveying in light carts and on horses his boats and leather-artillery, to which latter invention he had a peculiar partiality*: so that almost in an instant he crossed the stream and erected his batteries; a task the Polanders in their own minds allowed him a week to effect, and that with difficulty; having killed 200 of his opponents, and seized twelve (some say twenty-two) pieces of artillery; upon which it was commonly said by the Swedish soldiers, that the Polish general had found the spoil of a village in Mew, but that their king had created the plunder of a city in a half-inhabited island. Mean while Achatius Todt, who proved afterwards a renowned general in the German wars, (accompanied, as some say, with Lesley and Sperreüter, whose names will be better known in the course of our history) was dispatched with two troops of cavalry and a small body of dragoons to observe the motions of Conospoliski's army; but as the Poles, like the Croatians and such other desultory soldiers, have little resource but in the arts of surprize and stratagem, he found himself suddenly involved in an ambuscade in the forest of Grebin, and as there remained no possibility of a retreat, placed himself at the head of his men, and cut his way twice through the enemy, four times his superior in numbers, more with the air of a conqueror than like an officer who was compelled to act a disadvantageous part; for he conducted his troops safe to the camp, and brought four standards with him. Upon which the king rewarded the more distinguished officers 1528. and common soldiers, and conferred the honour of knighthood on their commander in as public and solemn a manner as he could devise*.

Upon this Conospoliski began to take flame in earnest, and marched up to the king's lines, who feared him not, as his army had been augmented by 9000 Scots and English soldiers, which, combined with his other troops, made a body of 24000 infantry, 2000 cavalry, and 3000 archers. How indeed a first-rate genius, enlightened in the arts of war like Gustavus, could condescend to employ this latter species of soldiers, will appear to most persons as something that exceedeth all common belief; but my own private conjecture is, that they were a combined mass of irregular barbarians who had deserted to the Swedes, and had been accustomed to use no other sort of military weapons. From whence it is natural to imagine that the king received them, merely because he could not decently reject them; for to his dying moments he hated that class of soldiers (if the name may be given them) called irregulars; partly on account of their depredations and cruelty, and partly because they had a talent for military mischief without ever producing any one positive military good. In proof whereof it has been assured me, that prince Eugene always honoured Gustavus for this great and just idea, and in consequence of it disposed the rabble of his Hungarians and Croats (though some of them since the days of Gustavus have been rendered regular) in such posts and situations only, where no particular pressures or efforts could be expected, allowing them barely the power of working harm, without being connected with more honourable forces. But, setting these barbarian combatants out of the question, the king had strength enough not to suppose Conospoliski so formidable an enemy, as that he ought to shun him; therefore to give his adversary a fair pretext of entering into an engagement, he gallantly confronted him upon equal ground; for a speedy decision was highly to be wished for by one who commanded an army in an hostile country, where provisions were procured with difficulty. The conflict was very obstinate on either side, but Gustavus finding himself able to bear the efforts of the Polanders without breaking his ranks, or causing the men to retreat, detached the best of his cavalry and infantry to make an onset 1628. on the rear of the Polish army. Measures were so well taken, that this march was made unperceived, and in the first and last attack the Poles lost 3000 men, four field-pieces, and fourteen colours; not to mention that Conospoliski himself was grievously wounded.

This event gave the citizens of Dantzic more serious thoughts; they saw themselves marked out as the great object of attention, and began to perceive, that they were more and more confined and limited every day; for the king by this time had blockaded their city with his land-forces, and stationed eight vessels at the mouth of their harbour to preclude all ingress and egress: this was giving the inhabitants a wound in the vital part; for a town of commerce soon lends an ear to accommodations when you can once divert the stream that feeds and supplies it: yet the remark failed in the present instance, (partly as Walstein had conveyed an Imperial fleet to their assistance) for the Dantzickers had the good fortune with eleven vessels in a sharp engagement (which lasted at least three hours) to defeat the Swedish ships; four of which (one being admiral Sternskield's) they took; and had probably treated the vice-admiral in the same manner, if he had not, more vain-gloriously than prudently, blown up his vessel and all the mariners into the air*. The Swedes lost a considerable number of people, besides their commander in chief, who died sword in hand; for in truth the Dantzickers, though less brave, were the better seamen: yet Appelman their admiral was killed, as were likewise several officers and 400 mariners: and as to the Swedish fleet, the remainder thereof was driven in a forlorn and shattered condition into the port of Pillau. Mean while Gustavus did not greatly relish this incidental disgrace, though the affair was transacted on an element where in truth he had acquired no great experience: of course in the first transports of his ill-humour he could not help repining, That a pacific commercial rabble (to use his own words) should beat a set of illustrious fellows, who made fighting their profession. But notwithstanding this momentary disappointment and chagrin, he soon contemplated the event with less prejudiced eyes, and, 1628. (as was always his custom) after the over-boiling of the first momentary heat, set himself to repair the loss with double diligence, attention, and patience; nor was it his temper ever to be angry or querulous after he had passed his first sentiments upon any unprosperous rencounter. Immediately therefore he replaced his former fleet with a second fleet of twelve ships, and having obstructed all commerce between Dantzic and other places, transferred that very maritime intercourse to the city of Koningberg; a place for commerce not injudiciously chosen, as an acute and sensible prince hath since demonstrated.

It was, if I mistake not, in this campaign, but upon what occasion one cannot say, that Oxenstiern attempted to dissuade his master from some undertaking of a very spirited and hazardous nature: My good chancellor, said the king, you are too cold for my temperament. Yes, Sire, replied the minister, yet if my ice did not infuse a damp into your fire, it is possible your majesty might have been scorched some years ago *. How far Oxenstiern had reason for insinuating this incidental reproof as to military enterprizes, is by no means here a matter of question. The king heard him with good humour, and dropped the conversation: nevertheless, it may suffice to observe, that no man more than Gustavus trusted in foresight, precaution, and the probable judgment of second-causes; so that many days before the breaking out of any important design, it was his custom to decline company, affect retirement, and stray abroad in the fields like a person immersed in thought. It was in one of these reveries that Gassion afterwards found him, alone, and wandering far distant from his camp and soldiers, at which very time his majesty was meditating to make his first trial of skill on the renowned Tilly.

A peace had now been talked of some months: it was to have been effected by the intervention of the Dutch ambassadors; but as in their journey they had made a private digression to the army of Gustavus, and conferred with him on the footing of openness and freedom, his Polish majesty paid little regard to their mediation, though in truth the terms proposed carried with them a better prospect than had presented itself formerly. Upon this a new scene broke forth to view:

* Schefferi Memorab. Succ. Gentis, p. 32.

for Gabriel Le Roy *, the Spanish minister, perplexed the cause on the Swedish side of the question, and baron D'Auchi, who afterwards assisted him, overturned all: the truth was, the houses of Austria and Spain began to perceive too manifestly from the generous, the prudent, the magnanimous turn of our northern hero, that he had it always in his power to disturb, if not destroy, the immense conquests they had made in Germany, the rich acquisition of ten the most prosperous campaigns that Europe had then beheld. It was therefore resolved by them to traverse the generosity or ambition of Gustavus. Prodigious therefore of promises, they assured Sigismund of securing to him the possession of all Sweden, and agreed to send him twenty-four men of war, 14000 veteran soldiers, and about 33000 l. sterling †. The first and last articles were never thought of afterwards, (excepting that D'Auchi deposited about 16000 l. by way of commencing operations) which breach of promise was an irreparable defect in point of politics, since a body of 20000 men, a moderate naval force, and one tenth part of a million of money, had unquestionably secured them in the possession of Germany for the century then to come, if not much longer. It is thought this parsimony or remissness proceeded purely from the Imperial court. For though the wary Spaniards, better politicians than the Austrians, feared Gustavus even at the greatest distance, and the rather, as the sagacious Spinola had always declared, that Gustavus was the only prince in Europe whom the two crowns ought either to find employment for, or cajole and amuse; yet the latter supposed him an impetuous enterprizer in war, and looked upon his men as novices and probationers in the school of fighting. Wallstein's extraordinary speech to Arnheim, when he sent him afterwards into Poland, seems partly to confirm this opinion, as will appear hereafter: and when Gustavus landed in Germany, the rodomontade at Vienna was, "That he was a king of snow, " and would soon melt to pieces as he advanced southward." The emperor, in conjunction with his allies and inclusive of garrisons, had likewise 170,000 seasoned men, most of whom had been engaged in ten afterwards into the king's hands when he entered Germany.

† The papers relative to this transaction fell

1628. years sharp service; and as for one part of them, the old corps of Burgundians and Walloons, who had been formed in the previous Low Country wars, they were looked upon as a collection of combatants esteemed invincible: yet genius and courage, placed at the head of an handful of men, soon counterbalanced all these seeming advantages: for Gustavus, by an extraordinary reach of parts, created a new system of fighting; and saw, moreover, that cruelty, rapine, lewdness, drunkenness, and immorality, were capable of bringing the best soldiers down to the common level. Yet as Sigismund had not the gift of foreseeing these disadvantages or advantages, it was his misfortune to listen to the proposals made by Spain and Austria. And great on the other hand was D'Auchi's surprise, when upon his arrival at Lubec and Rostock he saw plainly, that no use had been made of the money he had engaged to give with intention to put the marine in order. But this proceeded from no remissness in Sigismund. The truth was, the society of Hanse-towns withheld their co-operation and assistance, having no desire to see an Austrian admiral in the Baltic; nor did they chuse to give umbrage to the kings of Sweden and Denmark, who had just added a temporary article to their late alliance with reference to all intrusions upon the free sovereignty of the Northern ocean*, under condition that neither party should accede to new terms with any other prince or state without including his first ally. The naval enterprize being thus rendered abortive, Sigismund humbly requested, that the sum deposited might be made over to the uses of a land-war. But to that petition the Spanish minister pleaded want of instructions. This chicanery rather sharpened the king of Poland than dejected him; for though the senate, convened this autumn at Warfau, had complained of the prolongation of an ineffectual war against the Swedes, and had withheld as much as lay in their power the annual supplies, yet, in spite of all obstructions and retardments, he purchased and equipped ships with his own money, and placed them under the conduct of an excellent seaman, who on the approach of winter had attacked a Swedish squadron, which blockaded the harbour of Dantzic, conformably to what we have recounted before. 1628.

By this time the cold season began to approach ; but Sigismund and Conospoliski being now conjoined (for the latter had been dispatched for a short season to oppose an irruption made by the Tartars) formed a scheme of entertaining Gustavus with a winter campaign. But the king of Sweden had a great desire to refresh his men, and therefore applied himself to the grand secret of entrenchment, which was, properly speaking, a military invention congenial to his nature. In this situation he allowed the enemy to contemplate him during pleasure: upon which, struck with astonishment at the judiciousness of his encampment, Conospoliski undertook the siege of Dirschau, and Sigismund paid a visit to the inhabitants of Dantzic, whose fidelity to him justly merited that attention. In the month of November he held a national diet at Thurn, and supplies were voted for the war with greater unanimity than is usually to be found in Poland. Encouraged by a disposition of the nation so benevolent, it was proposed by the king's party to make a designation of a successor to the throne; upon which the nobility took fire, and demanded that the traitorous adviser of such a project should be given up to the mercy of the laws: so jealous were they of not appointing one king during the life of another.

And here I must ask the reader's permission to make a momentary digression from the subject before me, though the point relateth as much to Gustavus as any one action that hath been recorded by me; but as I know not under what year to arrange the fact (any further than that it happened in the Polish war) I therefore consider it as a sort of episode.

It was in one of these Prussian campaigns that the irrational practice of duelling arose to a considerable height in the Swedish army, not only amongst persons of rank and fashion, but between common soldier and common soldier: upon which Gustavus published a severe edict, and denounced death against every delinquent. Soon after a quarrel arose between two officers of very high command, and as they

1628. knew the king's firmness in preserving his word inviolable, they agreed to request an audience, and besought his permission to decide the affair like men of honour. His majesty took fire in a moment, but repressed his passion with such art, that they easily mistook him: of course with some reluctance, but under the appearance of pitying brave men who thought their reputation injured, he told them, that he blamed them much for their mistaken notions concerning fame and glory; yet as this unreasonable determination appeared to be the result of deliberate reflection, to the best of their deluded capacity, he would allow them to decide the affair at time and place specified: And, gentlemen, said he, I will be an eye-witness myself of your extraordinary valour and prowess.

At the hour appointed Gustavus arrived, accompanied by a small body of infantry, whom he formed into a circle round the combatants, Now, says he, fight till one man dies; and calling the executioner of the army to him, (or the provost-martial, as the language then ran) Friend, added he, the instant one is killed, behead the other before my eyes.

Astonished with such inflexible firmness, the two generals, after pausing a moment, fell down on their knees and asked the king's forgiveness, who made them embrace each other, and give their promise to continue faithful friends to their last moments; as they both did with sincerity and thankfulness*. So that from this period we find no duel between men of note in Gustavus's service; and though the edict above referred to is not to be found in the Swedish or German historians, yet in the king's military code (which admirable system of laws now lies before me) there are the same severe decrees against duelling (all injuries of honour being to be redressed by the army-consistory upon due complaint and representation); nor is it unknown by the curious, that this work was originally composed in Livonia, 1621, at or during the siege of Riga †. It was revised and corrected during the Prussian campaigns, particularly in the years 1626, and 1627, and lastly, nineteen fresh articles ‡ (and many more perhaps occasionally) and some new prayers were added † after his majesty arrived in Germany, 1628. being made public in 1631.

Nothing tormented Gustavus so much as the resistance made by the city of Dantzic; for commercial towns have infinite resources, and are always hard to be subdued. Nevertheless, as he had the affair so much at heart, it is probable he would have conquered it the preceding year; but a musquet-ball happened to wound him in the belly, in so much that his life was despaired of, and then the generals, losing all their hopes, proceeded languidly in the enterprize. As it was a maxim with Gustavus always to carry war into an enemy's country, he made this town the principal object of his attention, and the rather, as the enemy drew from it his greatest supplies. Having therefore new-modelled his fleet, which consisted of twelve large ships, the Swedes, by way of retaliation, soon overcame the combined Dantzic and Polish fleets, after an obstinate engagement, which lasted one continued day; forced the admiral's ship on a bank of sand, and there battered it to pieces †. A second ship of almost equal size and value, called Holland House, had certainly been taken, but after an incredible resistance of twelve hours, it happened to blow up into the air accidentally.

Gustavus now began to make his approaches in form round Dantzic on the land-side, having blocked up the mouth of the harbour with his fleet (which transferred the trade to other places, Koningsberg particularly.) He then passed a morass fifteen English miles long, at the head of 10000 soldiers in high confidence; being assisted in swampy and difficult gullies by particular bridges of his own invention, carrying likewise with him a large quantity of that artillery * which he himself had

† It only carried 40 guns, and was valued at 50000l. sterling.

* Whoever considers, extraordinary as such a consideration may be, that most of Gustavus's inventions expired with him, notwithstanding so many excellent officers had been formed under his eye, (the arts of war verging to a sort of decline from the death of our king till the times of Montecuculi and Turenne) will not be surprised if we hear no more of this invention of a new and more portable sort of artillery. Perhaps it was not so useful as was at first expected, yet this is barely a conjecture contrived to account for the inattention of mankind, since it is manifest, on the other hand, that the king used it from the year 1623 to the hour of his death.

These pieces were certainly of extraordinary service upon all sudden attacks in deep or mountainous countries, for one strong horse could convey 1628. had contrived, (than which nothing could be more useful in heavy countries, in case of a sudden attack) he conducted his army, contrary to all men's expectations, into a forest, which encircled the town on one side; taking in Schonec and Marnevec as he passed along.

Alarmed at so unexpected an approach, the magistrates of Dantzick began to fear an insurrection, as provisions, by the measures taken on land and sea, were thereby rendered extremely scarce. To augment these misfortunes, the Spaniards had so far deceived them with respect to twenty-four men of war, which they had promised to send to their support, that Wallstein on the contrary, supreme commander in the northern parts of Germany, (who ridiculously enough styled himself admiral of the Baltic, doing that inrodomontade which the court of Vienna affected in earnest) insisted on their sending nine ships to him, to facilitate the siege of Stralsund, and give laws to the sea-coasts. This doubly incommoded the Dantzickers, by depriving them of their own natural force, and by disobliging the king of Denmark, who ordered his navy to make reprisals on the people of Dantzick, whose ships they seized, and publicly confiscated. Yet the city itself escaped from Gustavus by a sort of miracle, for the rains fell to convey a couple of them as fast as any troops could march; and what was more, they could be shifted in an instant, according to the pressure and stress of an engagement.

Authors well instructed on this subject inform us. (Schefferi Memorab. Suec. Gentis; Pietro Pomo, Guerre di Germania, lib. i. p. 33.) that they were composed of the most hardened leather, girt round with iron or brass hoops, and could be brought to discharge ten times successively. Now if this account be true, they served to answer the purposes not only of sudden attacks, but of more decisive as well as more general engagements. About ten years ago, I happened to mention this sort of artillery to a person who had a passion for new projects: he seemed convinced that something might be struck out in this kind: and my learned and ingenious friend Mr. Johnson informs me, that he was just ready to ask the honour of his royal highness to be present at an experiment, but in that interim the poor man died. Thus much is certain, relative to our own situation at present, that nothing (upon an admission of the fact, to which I am an absolute stranger) can be more convenient to facilitate or oppose the landing of troops upon any sudden invasion, when every present moment is equal to a long future succession of hours.

Some give our hero the honour of first introducing dragoons into the military service; though Mansfelt (as we have observed elsewhere) puts in a sort of claim to this invention. Yet Scheffer's words (Memorab. Suec. Gent. p. 42. 43.) are very peremptory in Gustavus's favour: Primus sane fuit ipse qui pedites cum bombardis majoribus imposuit equis, illudque genus eduxit in aciem quod deinde dragoonarios vocant, ut sic celeritatem equitum & vim peditum ingeniosa hac mixtura in iisdem conquereatur.

such a prodigious degree, (the Vistula overflowing its banks in all places, and washing away the temporary bridges) that the Swedes were obliged to break up their camp, having no alternative, but starving with hunger, or perishing by water. But 5000 men were surrounded so suddenly by the inundation, that the king was obliged to feed them with uncommon difficulty, and more especially as he found himself in a country where provisions were rendered extremely scarce; but the food (such as it was) was religiously divided between this corps and the main army. When the floods began to sink, his majesty drew off all his forces, having received a body of recruits from Sweden in 54 transports, and 2000 cuirassiers, enlisted by the Rhingrave *. Taking Neuburg on the Vistula by surrender as he marched along, as also Straßberg and Dribentz, in all which places, particularly the former, the soldiers gained an immense booty, belonging to the Polish queen and nobles, and amounting, as the language of the age then ran, to six tons of gold, which make about 54000 pounds of money sterling. It was the king's idea to advance to Thorn, but this acquisition of wealth occasioned a series of countervailing inconveniences soon after; for the soldiers grew dissolute, and dispersed themselves over the country to find opportunities of consuming their riches: of course, some were put to the sword by the enemy here and there, and others surrendered on conditions which the Poles ill-observed; for they were all murdered in cold blood. Nothing hurt Gustavus like such violations of the law of nature, humanity, and common good faith; inasmuch that in the transports of his resentment he made incursions, like the hero of a romance, even to the gates of Massovia and Warsaw: and in one of these expeditions intercepted five pieces of artillery, which Wallstein had sent to Sigismund's army.

He then took the town of Sweitz by storm, and cut to pieces a body of Poles, who attempted to destroy a convoy that was marching to Straßberg. Amongst the prisoners at Massovia (which town was taken sword in hand) many Polish matrons and young women of fashion fell into the power of his soldiers, who being heated and enraged with the 1628. resistance made by the garrison, and rendered vicious by their late ill-acquired riches, might have proceeded to some outrages against the fair-sex; but the king crushed all attempts to incivility and rudeness in a single moment; telling the troops, That people who served under his command were to wage war and commit hostilities upon their own sex only, and that the ideas of a soldier and a ravisher ought to carry no connexion between each other. He then dismissed the ladies courteously upon the promise of their respective ransoms, inasmuch that no one woman received even the slightest insult.

Yet these digressions allowed no one thing to escape the attention of Gustavus. He therefore kept his eye constantly fixed on the depredations committed in the Baltic by the combined fleet of Spain and Austria, which he soon dispersed and ruined by stationing a good quantity of ships near Wismar: and then, in order to preclude the intervention of Sigismund, (of which previous notice had been given him) allowed the elector of Brandenburg six months space to deliberate whether he would embrace the Swedish or the Polish cause. It is well known the said prince secretly favoured the Swedes; yet had strong reasons, which must be obvious to all readers, to wish for a lasting accommodation between the two contending crowns, which he helped to effect the ensuing year; nevertheless, for the preservation of appearances, he sent 600 infantry to Sigismund, whom Gustavus contrived to intercept in their march. Nor was it difficult perhaps to be apprized of the route they intended to take; upon which Sigismund broke off all intercourses of friendship with the said elector.

During these transactions, Conospoliski contrived to retake Brodnitz, which La Mortagne, a French officer of repute, had surrendered some time before to the Swedes; for which precipitate determination the Polish general caused his head to be struck off publicly: and then, by way of retaliation, (being very dextrous in matters of surprise) defeated the rear-guard of the Swedish army, and took Banditzen prisoner, who was an officer of reputation.

at a ford that was ill-defended, defeated a large body of troops, and seized their cannon and baggage: and again, as he was traversing the country with 8000 men, in order to amass provisions for the army, which was then in no small distress, he surprised near Strasberg, at a small village called Rudovic, a large body of Croatians and Cossacks, and as he discovered them to be irresolute, or at variance in their opinions, he charged them so suddenly that he soon dispersed them, and carried off a convoy of 2000 carts and waggons, which greatly assisted the Swedish army during the remainder of the campaign, which was closed with lustre by a gallant performance of old count Thurn*; though the professed historians of that period have been silent upon the subject. It hath been observed before, that Gustavus had taken Neuburg. This town Conospolitzki besieged, and whilst he invested it (Thurn and Teuf-

* Mathias Henry, count de Thurn, one of the principal personages in Bohemia. He began the religious and civil commotions in that kingdom; nor did he ever submit to the house of Austria, but after the battle of Prague discharged several embassies in the name of Frederick (a sovereign of his own choosing) and Munsfelt, to Gabriel Bethlem, the grand signior, and the Venetians; took a commission under the latter in 1624, and being honourably dismissed when the elector Palatin disbanded his army, passed into the service of Denmark in 1627. Accepted of a general's commission under Gustavus, and being taken prisoner, was freed by Gallas, with orders, as was supposed, from Walstein; who, out of a capricious gallantry peculiar to himself, had a mind to rob the court of Vienna of so delicious a sacrifice. Some time afterwards, namely in 1634, he made a brave defence at Ratibon, and had the courage and address to procure his own exception in the capitulation.

This great patriot was supposed by some to be justly piqued, because Martinitz (one of the three judges that was precipitated from the window, in the first insurrection) had supplanted him in obtaining the government of Carlstein-castle, where the crown of Bohemia and all records of consequence were preserved. His speech to the chiefs of his country on the breaking out of the rebellion, as it is delivered down to us by

Nani, may keep pace with most of the pompous harangues of the ancient historians, and appears to me to have a better chance to be authentic; he concludes it in these words: "Liberty, from this example of ours, will insinuate itself throughout the empire, and though there be some appearance of violence in our conduct, yet necessity and piety will excuse the fact. There remains now no room for repentance, and no plea for forgiveness. The die is thrown—Freedom or the scaffold—Men of principle, if conquerors, men of conscience and independent—But if overcome, poor perfidious beings, perjured and rebellious."

Thurn, in the German language, signifies a tower, and therefore the French writers, conformably to their usual freedom and petulance, alembic the name into count La Tour; and Carte and the other English historians, when treating of the affairs of the Palatinate and Bohemia, talk of him very familiarly under that appellation: thus too, by the same rule of French impertinence, I might undertake as an Englishman to discourse of Mrs. Steel and her Homer, intending at the same time to be understood as speaking of madam Dacier.

There is a large exquisite print of count Thurn by Mirevelt, who engraved Gustavus and Oxenstiern in the same size: the fire of his eyes is inexpressible.

1628. fel being both commanders in it) young Thurn died of a fever. The old man writ to the Polish general to desire leave, as he only served Gustavus in the capacity of a volunteer, to remove the young man's body, that it might enjoy the rights of sepulture in a friendly country; but the request was denied. Enraged beyond measure at this refusal, he cut his way through the enemy's lines, by an admirable stratagem, with only fifty followers, and carried his son's corps to the place where the Swedish cancellaria was then held, never dismounting (but for the refreshment of a few moments) in a journey of eighty miles.

At the diet of Warfau, held in the month of July this year, a considerable number of the senators declared, that it was in vain to wage war against Gustavus, except hostilities were commenced against the elector of Brandenburg; upon which king Sigismond sent a slight message to him, admonishing him, in gentle terms, of the allegiance he owed the kingdom of Poland, by Denhoff his secretary, being privately determined, in case of an evasion or downright refusal, to levy money at all events, and pursue his object of destroying Gustavus. It was likewise suggested to the elector of Brandenburg, that his right to Prussia was a sort of feudatory tenure, dependent on the republic of Poland, which said fiduciary possession he might render forfeitable or not, in proportion to his future conduct. Nevertheless the nuncios of the provinces, and the major part of the senators, afforded Sigismond as little assistance as possible, upon presumption or private intelligence, that it was not difficult to obtain a tolerable peace. And thus the war proceeded languishingly on the Polish side.

Two disagreeable occurrences produced themselves this year in Germany, each sufficient to embarrass any mind but that of Gustavus: for the one was the siege of Stralsund, and the other the congress at Lubec. But the king carried his point in the first instance, and played his cards so dextrously in the second, as to give himself an advantageous opening soon after; for these two events were a part of the preparatory incidents which helped to conduct Gustavus into Germany.

Wallstein's great intention in possessing Stralsund, was to give laws at one stroke to the kings of Sweden and Denmark, and invade the domi-

nions of the latter without delay. In order to effectuate the transportation of his troops, Schwartzenberg was dispatched to the Hanse-towns, Lubec particularly, to demand such shipping as might be needful on the occasion, and grant them in the emperor's name some visionary privileges, upon condition they would confine their commerce for the future to the coasts of Spain, and the countries that depended on the house of Austria; but the answer returned to him was, that the said towns had confederations and alliances with neighbouring princes, (indeed Gustavus was the principal object alluded to) and that it would be highly imprudent in them to add fuel to particular wars, who subsisted by a general commerce with all mankind. Upon this Walstein (who affected to be extravagant in all things) procured a patent to be admiral of the Baltic, and having conquered Rostock, Wismar, and several other maritime towns, converted his thoughts to marine architecture, and sea-preparations. Stralsund alone obstructed his imaginary possession of the Northern ocean; for that city once conquered gave him just the inlet he desired: and as it was well-furnished with wealth, shipping, ammunition, and provisions, it was in a state of enabling him (at least as he conjectured) to land in Denmark; and make a conquest of the whole kingdom. The immense ambition of this project astonished Christian, and determined him to support the Stralsunders at any rate: and as he liked no corps in his service better than lord Rea's Scottish regiment, he transported it thither without delay. This was the first siege of consequence that Germany had hitherto seen. Walstein for his own sake, on account of the vicinity of Stralsund to his new dominions, was resolved to obtain it, whatever sacrifice he made. And it is thought by many he had formed a design to involve the duke of Pomerania in some embroilment with the emperor, whose territories (supposing them to be seized under any pretext) lay very commodious for facilitating and extending his vast project on the Baltic (not to mention their vicinity to his own dominions * in case of some new event or arrangement;) and for these reasons he poured regiments into Pomerania

* He had lately received the investiture of the duchy of Mecklenberg; but was never duke of Walstein, as the author of the Annals of the Empire inaccurately styles him.

1628. like swarms of locusts, with this difference, that they not only devoured the product of the earth, but squeezed the very last dollar from the inhabitants, and made the duke himself little less than a state-prisoner in his own castle. But to return to the siege: he first proceeded by artful means, and sent Arnheim, camp-master-general of his army, to the magistrates to demand winter-quarters for a certain number of men; but a compliance to this request was evaded. He then dispatched colonel Goëtz to ask passage only for a body of troops through the town; but that petition was not acceded to. Walstein then, in order to make the emperor a party concerned in his system, demanded of the inhabitants a contribution of about 25000*l.* concluding naturally enough, that the magistrates would still continue in an humour of denial; but they, contrary to his expectations, advanced part of the sum immediately, and pledged their honour for the rest, upon condition he erected no fortification near their town, as he had lately done. This prompt advancement of good six-dollars pleased Walstein's avarice, (for that general was equally avaricious to collect, and profuse to bestow) but did not satisfy his ambition: he therefore without further ceremony ordered Arnheim to invest the town. Upon this the inhabitants implored the assistance of their neighbours the Dantzickers; and Gustavus, to all appearances unasked, (though this circumstance shall not be confidently asserted) supplied them generously, as the seas were open, with a good quantity of military stores, of which the inhabitants at that time stood in great need. Oxenstiern indeed had partly opened the king's intentions in a conference held with the duke of Pomerania, wherein it was suggested casually, at least to all outward appearances, that Gustavus was determined not to see the poor Stralsunders deprived of commerce and liberty at one stroke, and that by such an interposition he manifested himself to consult the emperor's true glory and interests better than Walstein and the whole Imperial ministry could pretend to do. Mean while the duke of Pomerania (having fruitlessly requested Oxenstiern to abstain from all interposition with respect to Germany *) attempted to mediate a sort of convention between his Imperial majesty and the town; of which the conditions were: that all foreign troops should be dismissed from the garrison, and the city arrange itself under the protection of the said duke, passing its parole of honour to be faithful to the emperor, and give no obstruction to the Cæsarean troops then cantoned in the isle of Rugen (which was separated from the continent of Stralsund by a small frith of sea) and erect no new fortifications; with a proviso of admitting Pomeranian soldiers to guard the town. Upon this a treaty * was renewed, for former ones had subsisted between Sweden and Stralsund. Sadler undertook the task, and expressed his master's sentiments very dexterously; for allegiance to the emperor was inculcated strongly upon the inhabitants, and it was recommended to them to pay all due obedience to the duke of Pomerania; forasmuch as his majesty of Sweden had no object in view but to preserve the freedom of the Baltic, and maintain the immemorial rights and liberties of a town in those senses independent. During the attempt finally to adjust these articles, Wallstein marched with the eagerness of a new monarch to Gustrow, in order to receive the homage and oaths of allegiance from his subjects, inasmuch as the two dukes of Mecklenberg, Albert and Adolphus, had fought under the Danish ensigns, and laboured even then beneath that bitter sort of prescription, commonly called the ban of the empire, having paid no regard to a previous admonition from the court of Vienna. Colonel Holk had hitherto, at the head of the Danish forces, taken upon him the command of the town. The men were obliged to perform forty-eight hours service turn by turn for six weeks, and yet Holk, in the midst of this severe service, took it into his head to espouse a young wife, and celebrate his nuptials in a public manner; which all the German historians consider as a very unbecoming act of levity.

During Wallstein's absence, Gustavus took the advantage to convey some forces into Stralsund, which induced the inhabitants to change their language; so that the fine airy project of the duke of Pomerania vanished into nothing: that prince then persuaded the emperor to countermand the siege, which provoked Wallstein to such a degree, that he

* It is preserved by Lotichius, Tom. i. 608, and was to hold in force twenty years. Loccenii Historia Suecana, p. 560.

1623. sent a fulminatory letter to the elector of Saxony, whom he suspected to be at the bottom of this project; and what was still more, declined to obey his master's orders: and on the contrary, enraged with Arnheim's ill-success or remissness, made a journey to the camp in person, and renewed the attacks with incredible fury, swearing (according to his common custom of rodemontading) "that he would take Stralsund, though "it hung in the air from heaven by an adamantine chain." This was neither an easy nor a prudent task; for no place is better situated by nature. It fronteth the sea in a sort of elliptical figure, and at the two extremities joins itself to the main land by a narrow isthmus. Behind it lies the lake of Franken, which can be passed only in one place, by means of an high causeway: and what enhanced the difficulty still more on the part of the besiegers was this, that it was not in their power to obstruct the entrance of supplies into the harbour. I shall not give a full detail of this siege; it may suffice to say, that as Walstein pushed on his assaults with all the fury and industry that resentment could suggest, the Danes found the defence of the place beyond their strength: but a cessation of arms being agreed upon for a fortnight, a second regiment of Scots in the Danish service was thrown into the town during this interval, and then Christian, making a private treaty with Gustavus, cast the burden off his own shoulders, and transferred the danger and glory to his Swedish neighbour: who immediately sent Sir Alexander Lesly with a body of chosen troops to defend the town, and Holk for some time acted under him. This supporting of the poor Stralsunders confirmed Gustavus in the idea of interposing with the affairs of the continent, and giving laws thereto. At length Walstein, after a siege of three months, having half-ruined a numerous army, thought fit to dislodge, for he found, by dear-bought experience, that it is next to impossible to take a city that can at all times receive fresh supplies from sea, especially if the garrison behaveth with fidelity and courage.

The congress, which was held at Lubec this year, created fresh troubles to Gustavus. The convention of the plenipotentiaries at first was more solemn than it proved efficacious. On the part of the emperor came the baron Aldringer and count Gronsfelt, both colonels; Rupa, commissary-

fary-general, and Walmerode: and in behalf of his Danish majesty appeared Friefe and Uhlfelt, the one counsellor of the kingdom, and the other counsellor to the king; admiral Skeel, the two Rantzau, (who were both privy-counsellors) Levin, maréchal of the court, and secretary Gunter. These politicians, who were all extremely able in their way, eat, drank, affirmed, denied, intrigued and wrangled for six months; so that the year 1629 overtook them in their altercations; yet nothing of moment appears to have been decided. Much depended afterwards upon an event I am going to relate: Gustavus had parts enough not to allow a peace to be signed under his eye, without concerning himself more or less in an affair so critical: he therefore dispatched Spar and Oxenstiern (which latter was a relation of the prime-minister) to this assembly, with orders to see all things restored to their antient tranquillity, and solicit in particular for the town of Stralsund, and the re-instatement of the dukes of Mechlenberg, whom, as relations and neighbours, he had admitted under his more immediate protection. Some weeks before, secretary Salvius (who gave such proofs afterwards of his abilities at the peace of Munster) was sent into Denmark, to beseech his majesty to give introduction to the Swedish plenipotentiaries at Lubec: but that prince replied coldly by letter, after having taken an undue time to return an answer, That as he had received no commands from the court of Vienna, with reference to his Swedish majesty, he could not presume to venture on a step of so delicate and dangerous a nature, without being furnished previously with proper authorities: so that if these northern plenipotentiaries had any thing to offer which tended to the public utility, his advice was, that they should submit their proposals to the Austrian ministry at Vienna. The truth was, he loved not Gustavus, and dreaded the emperor: and most people at that time attributed this repulse to the haughtiness of Wallstein. Be that as it will, the king of Sweden resented this indignity in a manner conformable to his high spirit, (for if that prince had any one fault, it was being naturally liable to sudden transports of passion) and this affront struck so nearly to his heart, that he alledged it afterwards as one of the principal reasons that induced him to land his army on Imperial ground, and interfere with the state 1629. of affairs upon the continent: since it is reported by a writer * well-versed in the history of treaties, that the Swedish deputies were interdicted from entering Germany and approaching the congress, under pain of death. The result of the treaty at Lubec was, that his Danish majesty should content himself with the title of duke of Holstein, without presuming to suggest either his wishes or disinclinations to the emperor, with respect to the system of the Germanic body: that he should relinquish his pretensions to certain bishoprics on the continent, and restore to the Imperialists the islands of Femor and Neustrand, and such other places as he then possessed by right of arms: this premised, by virtue of the same treaty he was to re-enjoy his antient possessions, upon condition the emperor should still retain his old title to Holstein, Stormar and Ditmar; that the expences of the war should be re-imbursed, and the prisoners exchanged on either side. Nevertheless the king of Denmark (at least in order to preserve appearances) had courage enough to refuse a request that Wolfstein made him, of adding a small squadron to the Imperial fleet, under pretext of securing the free navigation and tranquillity of the Baltic †.

By this time Ferdinand had overcome all his enemies in the empire and round it, and erected the house of Austria into an universal monarchy. Which one of Wolfstein's deputies in effect acknowledged to the king of Denmark: for being asked if the Imperial party did not fear some check from the united efforts of France, England, Sweden, and Holland, replied unconcernedly, that the person who was once master of Germany, might despise the combinations of such remote and inconsiderable enemies. But God (to make ambition its own curse) has given it certain ideas of acquirable greatness that are unlimited, unreasonable, and (what is still worse) never to be satisfied. Ferdinand therefore, arrived now at the utmost height of human vanity, (for all things relating to finite beings have certain restrictions and limitations) found still a void in his own breast, and bethought himself of an ulterior glory wherewith to fill up this little niche of vacant fame: and this trifling succedaneum was neither more nor less, than the total extirpation of the protestant religion in Germany. The undertaking was arduous and hazardous, and therefore he began it gently : and as he was to walk in unfathomable waters, felt his ground step by step, before he obliged himself to take the desperate plunge.

He made his first essay warily and cautiously enough, upon his own hereditary dominions ; and published an edict to this import, that all persons of the evangelical persuasion must leave their possessions and depart, or conform to the popish religion within a time prescribed. Even one sixth of Austria itself was then peopled with protestants, and Bohemia, Hungary, Moravia, Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, boasted still greater numbers ; many likewise wavered in their faith, and a good number concealed their sentiments till some general decision should put their declarations out of danger. Yet the publication of this edict produced more trouble than was first apprehended. The peasants of Bohemia (where the spirit of religious liberty could never be extinguished) formed themselves into a body, in spite of all former decimations and proscriptions, and concerted a design of seizing the emperor and his attendants on a hunting-day, when probably they would have given his ambition its decisive stroke. The conspirators drew lots who should atchieve this desperate undertaking : but chance or infidelity made an ample discovery of the whole plot, and the author escaped into Hungary, and then refuged himself in the Ottoman dominions.

This prelude of religious tyranny being thus brought to an happy event, the emperor boldly displayed his whole game at once, performing what his predecessors, from the perverseness of circumstances in their disfavour, had long fruitlessly desired to effect : and published the famous edict of restitution *, which at length brought Gustavus into the empire, and overturned the labours of twelve of the most prosperous campaigns that the house of Austria, or any European power, had ever seen. For that little cloud which arose in the North, no larger than the palm of a man's hand, to make use of the words of Holy Scripture, collected its force so suddenly, and disspread that force so violently, that it blotted

Ferdinand therefore, solicited hourly by the princes of his own persuasion, and mighty-well inclined to bigotry on his own part, under pretence of making the formulary of the religious peace, concluded at Augsberg by the common consent of all the Germanic princes, his rule and guide, gave orders to his men of politics and jurisprudence to compose and digest this mighty work, of which the publication (that it might be rendered more complete) was deferred till the ensuing year; during which interval application was made to the principal catholic princes to deliver in their opinions on so delicate and dangerous a subject.

Amongst a considerable number of ecclesiastical benefices marked out in a catalogue delivered to the emperor, these few following ones were selected for the first sacrifice, namely, the archbishoprics of Magdeburg and Bremen, the bishoprics of Minden, Osnabrug, Halberstadt, Verden, Lubec, Ratzburg, Schwein, Camin, and the abbacy of Hirschfeld; and what was somewhat extraordinary, they all afterwards shared the fate of secularization by the consent of both religions at the peace of Munster, excepting Osnabrug (in which the catholic party reserved an alternative) and Lubec: which latter had taken its share in the common wreck, if the chapter had not engaged itself, one year before the peace was concluded, to chuse six bishops successively from the house of Holstein-Gottorp, to which family the plenipotentiaries assigned the administration of the bishopric.

Thus the papists artfully enough paid the protestants out of their own church, and the latter swallowed the bait without any hesitation, though they had been fighting (as they pretended) thirty years for the support and dignity of that very church. Magdeburg, Minden, Halberstadt, and Camin, were all erected into principalities, and given to the house of Brandenburg. Bremen and Verden were denominated duchies, and assigned to Sweden; Ratzburg and Camin were dignified with the title of principalities, and bestowed on the duke of Mecklenberg; and

Hirschfeld

Hirschfeld was styled a principality too, and conferred on the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. 1629.

At length, to the infinite disquiet of the protestant party, the edict of restitution was published, and commissaries dispatched into all the provinces, to effect the restoration of the several acquisitions which the evangelical party had been supposed to procure to themselves since the treaty of Passau. There was one clause in it particularly embarrassing: for in case a papist had turned protestant since that period, yet the possession was not to follow its natural and original master. Thus confusion was rendered more confused; and what was equally disagreeable, no prince was out of the reach of the decree; for it affected the friends of Cæsar as well as the enemies. The first and principal personages in the empire felt a certain disinclination to relinquish rich ecclesiastical benefices, which served to make ample provision for their children and relations; and some princes there were, whose acquired possessions in this very light exceeded their patrimonial ones. It was objected therefore, that long and undisturbed occupancy ought to be considered in good politics as a thing sacred, and a sort of title: and it was decreed likewise, that the protestants ever assented in the peace of religion to the insertion of the article in reference to the restoration of the bona ecclesiastica; and as a proof of this, appeal was made to the journals of the whole transaction: it being plain beyond contradiction, that the said clause had been squeezed into the instrument of peace by the obstinate perseverance of the papists, and the meer arbitrary violence of the emperor. Here the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg joined issue, and requested that the difficulty might be referred to a new general diet, inasmuch as what related to all ought to be examined and decided by all. To this the Imperial party replied, that the determination of the affair belonged solely to the emperor, as appeared from several recesses* of

* To understand this expression the reader must observe, that what the states establish in a diet by plurality of voices, is called placitum Imperii, a decree of the Empire. When the emperor approves this decree, it then becomes an Imperial decree in form, and is named conclusion Imperii, a conclusion of the Empire. And when the aforesaid acts are signed and published in the forensic sense of the word, they are then styled recessus Imperii, or recesses of the Empire.

1629. the empire, and the last resolutions agreed upon by the electoral convention held at Mulhausen.

Upon this the commissaries set forth to visit their respective districts, with orders particularly to summon before them (at different times and places of hearing) all those who detained church-possessions, and all those who sued for their restitution ; and in case unjust occupation and detention were once proved, the party delinquent was to be commanded in the emperor's name to make restoration ; nor was the matter to admit of any adjournment, though it was alledged that the cause was then depending in the chamber of Spires, or that it was determined to lodge an appeal in the next general diet, since the last edict had provisionally precluded all such obstructions and interferences. Cathedral and collegiate bodies were referred to the pope's declaration, which was expected to appear daily ; and by way of encouragement to those who submitted frankly, and without any resistance, all past profits were to be allowed them : whereas at the same time a retrospection in this point was threatened to the refractory, and a prompt interposition of the military power. But in this rapid career of arbitrary persecution, the popish party made a false step in the very first act of partition, for many old occupants expected (which was natural enough) to re-enter into their possessions, whereas new claimants started up, equipped with no other title than a free grant from the emperor and the pope.

The first difficulty began at Augsburg, which appeared really to be something ominous, as the famous confession had been presented there. The then bishop demanded his intire jurisdiction ; and a military force supported the authority of the Imperial commissary. In vain the elector of Saxony presented remonstrance after remonstrance : the protestant ministers were rejected from their parochial cures, and the inhabitants of the same persuasion prohibited from attending divine service, not only in the city, but in the neighbouring villages and fields. The circumstance of this transaction piqued the elector of Saxony almost as much as the transaction itself ; for he considered Augsburg, with respect to the evangelical religion, as the place of its re-fuscitation ; and was mortified also to observe, that matters stood now on as bad a footing as they did some time before the peace of religion was agreed upon; and what alarmed him moreover extremely was, that the writers of the opposite party asserted in numberless fugitive pieces, that the evangelical religion was not the same system of belief and practice which had been set forth formerly in the Augsburg-confession. This, as he well foresaw, was laying the axe to the roots of the reformation, since if that allegation was once allowed to be true, no person of the evangelical persuasion, as then professed, had any certain rights or interests in the peace of religion. He therefore summoned all the eminent civilians and divines of his party to a meeting at Leipzig, and combined their arguments together in one apology against the Romanists, setting forth, that the elector of Saxony, and other protestant princes and states, had presented a clear and well-reasoned confession of faith to Charles V. (which act, reciprocally authenticated by both parties, had been enrolled in the registers of the empire) and as they had persevered inviolably in the same system, without any addition to it, or diminution from it, it was therefore absolutely equitable and reasonable to expect, that they should not be precluded from the protection and advantages which the peace of religion granted them, as it was composed and regulated by the principles of the aforesaid confession.

During these transactions a new persecution had arisen in Bohemia of a very extraordinary nature, upon which many unhappy emigrants refuged themselves in Sweden; for an edict was published, that all women of the evangelical persuasion, that were married to catholics, (whereof there were numberless examples) should be exposed, ipso facto, to banishment, except they retracted. The severity of this decree gave uneasiness to the papists themselves, whom it affected: for the first officers of state, and nobles of the kingdoms, had intermarried freely amongst the protestants before the breaking out of the civil wars (inasmuch as the ladies in Bohemia became heiresses almost in the same manner as they do in England;) upon this account the husbands, fearing a confiscation of their wives possessions, expressed an awkward 1629. fort of dislike, and the rather, as no divorce was proposed by way of salvo and indemnification: but the ladies took a nobler part; they exclaimed loudly against this matrimonial persecution, and not a single woman left her house and family. Thunderstruck with such perseverance the Imperial chamber issued out, May 1, 1629, a second edict of the explanatory kind, allowing the fair-sex a sort of toleration till the husband's death; after which event they were deprived from the right of possession, and enjoined to transport themselves into some other country, under prohibition, during the interval, to exhibit themselves at any nuptials or other public entertainments, except upon condition of giving precedency to every woman of the catholic persuasion. How arbitrary must a sovereign be, who can enact laws of so afflictive a nature to the poor females!

Whilst the commissaries executed their office with great severity in the judicial way, and both parties (to change the nature of their former disputation) engaged with great acrimony upon paper, a new complaint took its rise, which affected both sides deeply, though perhaps not equally, and that was the licentiousness, rapine and cruelty of the Imperial army, which Wallstein had augmented to a degree insupportable: even though 10000 men had been sent into Poland against Gustavus, and a considerable supply detached for the service of the arch-duke in the Low Countries; not to mention an army of near 30000 combatants employed in Italy on the reduction of Mantua.

Wallstein administered occasion to farther complaint, for all Germany trembled at the thoughts of war, and that general was indefatigable in seeking opportunities to create a new one. As he was a punctual man in matters of severity, he sent colonel Pecker to Magdeburg with a regiment of Croatians, in order to receive the contribution he had imposed on the town; which was an errand disagreeable enough to a city not over wealthy, and which valued herself upon being by no means the most ignoble of the Hanseatic towns. Upon which the populace (whether with or without the connivance of the magistracy cannot be asserted) seized some ships of corn that were making their way down the Elbe to Wallstein's army, and committed some slight acts of hostility on the regiment then quartered near the town. The magistrates made shew of great external disapprobation upon this occasion, but Walstein, naturally vindictive and of a temper uncontrollable, (bearing them likewise an antient hatred, as they expressed no joy when he became their neighbour, and was created duke of Mechlenberg) sent them word immediately, that by way of making their peace with the emperor, they must levy a regiment of soldiers for his service, and maintain them at their own expence. A memorial was presented to him with a view to deprecate the severity of this command, but Walstein rejected their applications with scorn, and ordered a part of his army not only to blockade, but invest the town. Upon this the Hanseatic cities took the alarm, particularly Brunswic, Lubec, and Hamburg, and sent deputies to him, in hopes to break the force of his anger, and induce him to withdraw his troops. His answer was, (and if they knew the man they had reason to expect something of that nature) that the corn must be restored him in the first place, and the several delinquents delivered into his custody; (sufficient caution being also given him for all future good behaviour on the part of the citizens) and that then the contribution levied upon them must be discharged, and an Imperial garrison admitted into the town, in order to give laws to the fury of the populace. From that moment the magistrates of Magdeburg had a clear presentment that their destruction was determined, since a garrison would always have the power to exact contributions at will, and introduce the edict of restitution whenever they pleased. Be that as it will, they chose to wait the event of their ruin, and refused gloriously to admit the garrison; promising at the same time to give implicit obedience to the emperor in every other respect. They then besought leave to send their deputies to Vienna, but Walstein denied them that favour, (being advanced by this time as far as Gustrow) and gave the inhabitants to understand moreover, that if they did not receive his garrison in five days, all future accommodation should be precluded. Nevertheless that general, from some motive undiscoverable to us at present, (for the inhabitants had made all possible preparations for a desperate defence) contented himself with 1629. bare threatenings, and lowering his tone all in a moment, absolved them even from the payment of the contribution he had before demanded, and requested nothing further of them, but to persevere in affection and loyalty to the emperor. Some suppose that he dreaded to assault a set of men rendered desperate by oppression; but Walstein was not subject to terrors of that kind: others conjecture that he had received a positive countermand from his master; but such he had often disobeyed upon other occasions: therefore my private opinion is, (and that seems to me most conformable to his character) that he feared to irritate Gustavus, who then wanted an occasion to invade Germany, (for Gustavus was an object of fear even to Walstein) or that he thought it imprudent to kindle up a war just in the neighbourhood of his new-acquired dominions.

Gustavus was greatly enraged with Walstein's insolence at the late convention, for part of the outrage committed against his majesty's dignity was ascribed to him; and determined to push the war with such vigour, as to force the Poles into a compliance. In these campaigns he relied chiefly on the connivance and private favour of the elector of Brandenburg, whose sister he had married; for that prince secretly wished him well as far as he durst, and permitted him tacitly, in case disastrous events might fall out, to retreat and shelter his troops in his dominions. It was in this after-game that Gustavus placed his confidence, upon supposition any signal misfortune should befall his army. Nevertheless, a part of the elector's affection could not be concealed from the suspicious and watchful Austrians, and that was the free-occupation he granted Gustavus of the port of Pillau, through which intercourse the Swedish army was chiefly supported, not only as to provisions and implements of war, but also with respect to re-inforcements.

As Walstein had pressed the town of Stralsund extremely hard, and Gustavus had sent the inhabitants a succour of 500 men, and a good supply of ammunition, the court of Vienna grew enraged to such a degree, that in consequence thereof it was determined to dispatch Arnheim to the assistance of Sigismund *. Him Walstein dismissed with this extraordinary injunction: " Arnheim, take 10000 men, and drive Gustavus out of Poland; and in case you cannot perform that task, tell him Walstein will come and effect it himself †." Which vain-gloriousrodomontade puts me in mind of a speech that an Irishman made to one of our Henrys, who was sent by a certain Mac-Gilpatrick, chief of Upper-Osory, to the king, to complain against the deputy of that province; he met his majesty going to chapel, and delivered his embassy in these words: " Sta pedibus tuis domine rex; dominus meus Gilla-Patricius me misit ad te, & jussit dicere, quod si non vis castigare Petrum Rufum, ipse faciet bellum contra te."

Nevertheless the Poles admitted these troops into Prussia with a sort of diffidence ‡, notwithstanding Sigismund declared that he had personally requested such assistances from the emperor, in order to extirpate the Swedes from Prussia, and recover his own hereditary dominion of Sweden. Yet the senators entered coldly into his allegations; for Arnheim (as being the slave of Walstein's inclinations) was looked upon as a person of suspected faith: and upon this the orders of the kingdom replied, that Gustavus, on supposition he was not provoked, was too far removed from their concern: and if his majesty had carried his zeal for popery, by the advice of the pontifical party, to the very precipice of extremity, it was now his own personal business to recover the crown of Sweden by the self-same assistances.

As the Polish senators dealt much in plain-dealing and free-speaking, so the states of Sweden distinguished themselves in another respect, and that was in affection and loyalty: " Representing to their master in the strongest and tenderest manner, that as Sigismund had refused the reasonable offers which had been made to him by the deputies of Brandenburg and Holland, and insisted that Sweden should restore to him all the conquests that had been made in Livonia and Prussia; as he had requested an auxiliary army from his Imperial majesty, and as the emperor had insolently denied admit-

 “ to commence the war with re-doubled vigour, and fix the seat of it “ in some foreign country, that being in their opinion the most ad“ vantageous method of carrying on hostilities: it appearing to them “ infinitely more dangerous and fatiguing to protect their own coasts, “ and less reputable and distinguishing likewise in the eye of the pub“ lic.” It was then voted, that money should be raised conformably to the taxes at that time subsisting; that the recruits to be levied should be continued for two years certain, and that the marine should be placed on the best footing that human prudence could devise: and to strengthen the fleet particularly, each nobleman, who furnished an horse to the military service, engaged to subscribe about eight pounds. Large sums were likewise promised from the India company, and the clergy and people in trade agreed to furnish out fifteen armed ships. At the conclusion of the meeting the king paid a very gallant compliment to three of his officers; for he made Horn, Banier, and Todt, all senators.

Some time afterwards arrived an embassy from Muscovy, with full powers to make his majesty an offer of dispatching of an army into Poland against Sigismund*; but the proposal was declined with thankfulness and courtesy: either because the king had some presentment of an approaching accommodation, or because he never relished the assistances of irregular forces; for he always considered war as over-cruel and sanguinary, even without the intervention of barbarian combatants.

Arnheim by this time had made Higher Pomerania the rendezvous of his troops †. He then marched to Grandrentz, a city of Poland, lying on the east side of the Vistula, in order to join Conospoliski, whom the Imperialists considered as a warrior of reputation. In twelve days time, the Polish general encamped his troops on the eastern side of the Vistula, opposite to Arnheim, who, as yet, could not reach Grandrentz. 1629.

A bridge of boats was then thrown over the river near Marienverder, in order to promote the junction of the two armies, whose respective generals, after that was effected, took care to regulate their marches in such a manner, and with such dispositions, as to be prepared for battle in case they were forced to engage. The emperor's army always made the right wing, as the post of honour. Amidst their various decampments from place to place, advice was at length brought them that Gustavus approached. Arnheim and Conospoliski held themselves in readiness to receive him, and (to prevent surprize) marched in battle-array to a little town called Marienverder, about six miles from Thorn, where Gustavus then was at the head of a part of his army, which had made an advanced journey, in order to contemplate the countenance of the enemy. The Imperialists being apprised of Gustavus's intentions, decamped before break of day, with a view to render themselves masters of a difficult passage, situated in the midst of a wood, and capable to afford them opportunities of making great resistance. Here, in a sort of amphitheatre, stood a mill, situated on the banks of a considerable river, near which was a large morass, that on one side rendered the approach very difficult: the other side was likewise protected to a certain degree, inasmuch as a wood was to be traversed by the assailants, and the roads thereof were constrained and narrow. It is certain, if Gustavus had pre-occupied this post, according to his own intentions, the Poles and Imperialists had been both embarrassed more than sufficiently; but fortune favoured the united armies; some of whose troops arrived there before the Swedes, and made a lodgment by the dint of industry; for Conospoliski, who well knew the importance of the post, marched all night at the head of nine regiments, besides two regiments of dragoons and Cossacks, and began to entrench himself by break of day. He then placed a grand guard at the front of the wood, on that approach next the Swedes, for fear of being surprized in his obstructed and concealed retirement. A part of his advanced troops, favoured by the darkness of the night, dispersed themselves here and there through the fields that extended beyond the wood,

1629. wood, and brought intelligence at break of day, that a regiment of dragoons, and another of horse, were in full march to secure the post in question.

These troops were conducted by the Rhingrave *, a hot young man, who had like to have ruined his master by his impetuosity ; for Gustavus had ordered him to push on and secure the passage, upon supposition only that he met with no notable opposition † : but the Rhingrave (who afterwards, to do him justice, became a more composed and regular general) urged his men on with that extremity of resolution, that the enemy soon found it expedient to relinquish to him this first situation ; though their number more than counterbalanced that of the Swedes ; for he attacked them with that fury and intrepidity, that he allowed not his dragoons an opportunity to dismount, which was an order the king had given him for particular reasons.

Had this brave young man stopped here till Gustavus came up, all had been safe ; and it is probable a signal victory might have ensued ; yet it no-where appears that his master was angry with him ; for it was his notion there should be rather too much fire in youth, in order to supply proper remains for maturer years.

The Rhingrave advancing briskly to pursue his point, prepared himself to force a second entrance. Arnheim and Conospoliski being informed of this rencounter, and of the design of the enemy, imagined themselves to be out-done both in dexterity and bravery. Upon this instructions were given, that a large division of the army should approach, in order to sustain those who defended the passage and the mill. The troops marched with such diligence that they supported their comrades, who otherwise must have sunk under the superiority of the Swedes, who attacked like men possessed, and whom neither the difficulty of the ground, nor the perpetual discharge of musquetry, could compel to retreat. Nevertheless, the Imperial cavalry, after galloping a good hour, was so fortunate as to prevent the Swedes from making any farther progress, and arrived just at the point of time when the engagement began to proceed to the last extremity : for Gustavus in that instant had just joined his men with a re-inforcement of some regiments, and some chosen troops ; but soon found that matters were not so circumstanced as to favour his undertaking : but being a man of honour, he was resolved to bring his suffering soldiers off with credit ; for the Rhingrave had lost five colours, and 200 men were killed ; not to mention the prisoners. At this very instant Gustavus learnt, that besides part of the Polish army, the whole Imperial force was advancing to attack him, (a set of hardened and experienced troops, far more respectable than the Polanders) which induced him to think of founding a retreat ; and not engaging himself imprudently in a place, and in an attack where he could not succeed but by a combination of fortunate circumstances hardly to be expected : for his majesty had no intention to draw on a battle that day, but only secure a pass, leaving the better part of his army at a good distance behind under Wrangel's care, and having no more with him than 8 or 10000 selected men, wherewith to oppose an enemy who outnumbered him by two thirds. But at the moment he was meditating to file off and retire, two fresh regiments of Imperialists arrived, and dismounting immediately, fell on with such fury, that they oppressed the Swedish troops by weight and number, and drove them back to the extremity of the wood where the Polish grand guard had first lodged themselves. At the same time Sirot joined the Imperialists with the regiment of Arnheim, seven select companies of foot, and two regiments of Cossacks ; so that Gustavus was obliged to retire behind an hill of sand, about 3000 paces from the entrance of the wood, and range his troops afresh in a situation where one could not readily see them, or form a notion of the dispositions then made. After various skirmishes and attacks on loose uneven ground, Gustavus contrived to mount the eminence of an hill, on which there was a large area, protected on one side by a marsh and wide lake, and on the other side by a deep ditch, which came out of the wood and environed the space, round which was a meadow of no inconsiderable dimensions : and there Gustavus

1629. lodged his troops. After several rencounters, which took different turns, being of a variable and equivocal nature, the Imperial army at length came up, but was greatly embarrassed for want of sufficient room to act in. Amidst this confusion, the Polish troops that were first on the post determined to make themselves masters of the summit of the hill. To this effect, they all advanced in one line, excepting the Cossacks, who marched a few paces after them at right and left. On this new movement the Swedes redoubled their efforts; but the numbers that acted against them were so disadvantageous, and the fire of the musquetry so greatly superior in frequency and quantity, that they resigned the top of the hill to their adversaries, who entrenched themselves there. Gustavus had strong reasons for making this sacrifice, though highly contrary to his natural temper; for he chose not to lie so near a determined enemy, when there was nothing to divide the combatants but the rubbish of some old ruins.

In this third retreat the Cossacks incommoded extremely the regiment of the Rhingrave in flank, which obliged him to attack them in self-defence. But unfortunately, in making this movement, he necessarily laid himself open to Sirot, who, though inferior in point of men, seized one of those critical moments in war, (which never present themselves a second time) and made so judicious and opportune an attack, that the Swedish army was obliged to face about. And now regiment opposed regiment, in like manner as one man engages another; the irregulars upon the whole did much mischief, especially upon the right wing of the Swedes. A series of misapprehensions and misconduct in inferior officers had drawn Gustavus into such a dilemma, that he resolved for a short space to try what an incredible effort might effect: he fought therefore at the head of the first regiment like a common foldier, with an intrepidity not to be described. Sirot missed killing him very nearly; nor was the king deficient in returning the like intentions. To comprehend this matter more exactly, it must be known, that the gallant Frenchman had shot the cornet of the pretorian regiment of guards, and wanted to carry off the colours. Gustavus, who was engaged just by, seeing the officer on the ground, and judging rightly of the French baron's designs, instead of taking a little path, which would have conducted him more safely round the edge of the lake, advanced towards Sirot by a shorter passage, and lodged a carabine-ball in his right arm, intending to have shot him through a vital part. Sirot advancing, made a return with his pistol, and fired so near the king's head, that he burnt his hair, and either the ball, or the motion the king made on the occasion, caused his hat to fall to the ground. Sirot had by chance a domestic with him, who being insensibly drawn into the combat, and having a desire, as his horse was killed under him, to seize the horse of the cornet whom Sirot had shot, took up (as he was then on foot) the king's hat, and gave it his master. Sirot had not escaped so cheaply, had it not been for a coat of mail which he wore under his hongreline. He neither knew the king, nor the king him.

It is said by an author *, (not that I relate that writer's account for matter of fact, having no collateral authorities) that this very impious and heretical hat was sent by the house of Austria to adorn the shrine of the lady at Loretto; which, saith the same person, is less to be wondered at, inasmuch as the father of critics had the presumption to bequeath his night-gown to the said holy virgin. Whereupon a wit of that age wrote the following distich :

In morte fecit Lipsius solæcisimum.*

But to return to the action last mentioned. Upon the whole, certain it is, that the king always disliked this loss of his beaver, and comforted himself as well as he could with the following application to the enemy :

———*Victor ovat spolio, gaudetque potitus.
Tumo tempus erit magno cum optaverit emptum

1629. We have no account of the numbers slain on either side; yet the regiment of Bindhauf, esteemed the very finest in the Imperial service, was intirely ruined: and fourteen ensigns of foot and five of horse were taken by the Swedes. Who were made prisoners, and who were slaughtered, appeareth not, excepting a Swedish velt-maréchal (whom I suppose to be Wrangel*) and count John, the Rhingrave's brother. Sirot's men took him, but the Polanders attempted to rob them of their capture, in expectation of a large ransom. In this tumultuous contest the poor young nobleman was unfortunately killed. The king received five musquet-balls that day on his armour: Conospoliski engaged hand to hand with a Swedish cornet; so violent was his inclination to seize a pair of colours in his own proper person; but his horse sunk under him, being pierced through with several balls; and, like Gustavus, he was taken prisoner, and then rescued. In one part of this series of engagements, he exhibited a practice in war, which will hardly be credited in a Polish officer; and very probably it was his own invention; and that was a masqued battery, secured by a redoubt †, which made an unexpected and deplorable carnage.

One Soop, a captain of horse, disengaged the king, who was fighting amidst a body of Polanders that knew him not. A Polish horse-foldier had clapped a pistol to his ear, when Soop shot him in the very act of attempting to give fire; for Gustavus was fullen, and refused to ask quarter, or follow the enemy. Soop then, at the head of his own troop of cavalry, soon dispersed the crowd round his master, and seizing his bridle by force, compelled him to retire: for which the king created him a chevalier in the public assembly at Stockholm ‡.

The two generals determined to give Gustavus a second attack the next day; but the king's capacity foresaw the inconveniencies, and a maréchal of his camp reinforcing him by order with 3000 fresh men, gave him an opportunity to retreat triumphantly without the least retardment from the enemy.

* This officer (whose christian name was Herman) must not be confounded with Charles Gustavus Wrangel, who made so great a figure after the death of Gustavus Adolphus.

‡ Soop, Henry, commanded eight troops of horse at the battle of Leipsic.

His majesty's conduct on this occasion (allowances being made for the Rhingrave's impetuosity, and for his not possessing the post in dispute some hours sooner than perhaps it was possible for him to have done) had all things to boast which a great general can lay claim to. His personal bravery was perhaps justly blameable; except we consider, that he was training and forming himself in the apprenticeship of war; and all commanders at first must give the troops an high idea of their personal valour. His presence of mind was extraordinary; he never lost his coolest thoughts for a moment; but made the immediate and only proper use of every man that came to his assistance; his dispositions, his changes, his efforts, his attacks were such, that the cuirassiers of the Imperial army (who were armed cap-a-pe, and deemed irresistible) could never break him, or force him to fight beyond his choice; and the retreat he made was carried to the utmost pitch of glory that the circumstances could admit of. Sirot took nine pieces of leather-cannon, and two of cast-metal, from four to six pounders.

The king afterwards earnestly desired to have an interview with that officer, and gave him many encomiums with great politeness. He pressed him much to serve under him, and, as Sirot only commanded some select companies in the Imperial army, offered to place him at the head of as many regiments in the Swedish service. Sirot at that time made his excuses, upon the footing of a man of honour, who had engaged his word elsewhere: Trust me, replied Gustavus, *and quit the party you have espoused; assuredly else you will be obliged to do so in a few years: for if ever a peace be concluded between Sweden and Poland, I that moment will declare war against the emperor, conjointly with the king your master: and if you chuse not to comply with my request at present, promise me at least, when you have delivered back your companies, to give me a meeting. When the king afterwards had made some progress in Germany, he writ to Sirot with his own hand: Sirot hastened to him: but in that interval Gustavus was killed, and the Frenchman served under the duke de Weymar.

1629. At night Gustavus retired to his old camp at Marienberg, and the two generals retreated to the post they had defended; since in truth they could not possibly find a more secure and advantageous situation. Their army passed the whole night under arms; but no enemy molested them.

The next day two prisoners of the Swedish army (one of which was named Hume, a Scotsman, who commanded a regiment of German horse) were greatly surprised to see Sirot wearing the king their master's hat: Sirot himself being entirely ignorant unto whom it belonged. They wept: they exclaimed: they acknowledged it to be Gustavus's. They implored in the most earnest manner to be informed if the king was dead. Sirot recounted the transaction to them; upon which they recovered a little from their anxiety and surprise.

Soon after the conjoined armies retired to Marienverder, in order to observe Gustavus's motions. At this time his Polish majesty arrived in the camp; changed the dispositions the generals had made, and the designs they had formed: for having summoned a grand council of war, he proposed to seek Gustavus in his entrenchments at Marienberg, and make an attempt to force them; proceeding upon a presumption, that they could not yet be brought to any notable posture of defence: but in that circumstance he little knew the military skill, the prudence and diligence of his antagonist: who in eight days had rendered his camp unapproachable; being protected on one side by a morass, and on the other side by a little river; and having only a small assaultable opening, which Gustavus had rendered highly defensible with excellent entrenchments and fortifications: be that as it will, the king of Poland had still an inclination to force his enemy's lines; and having made several unsuccessful attempts, was at length repulsed with very considerable loss. In consequence of these mortifications, Sigismund determined to encamp himself not far from his old entrenchments. Arnheim quitted the Poles, and taking with him his four regiments of horse, and four of foot, lodged himself at Neuburg, near the Vistula, where the enemy had erected a fort in a small island. Forming a design therefore to make himself master of this fort, he attacked it with a body of soldiers, whom he transported over in boats; but the enterprise miscarried improsperously enough: so that after various unsuccessful attempts, he connected himself a second time with the Polish army, and encamping near Gustavus, gazed upon him inactively during the remaining part of the campaign. It is true, the united generals spared no pains to allure Gustavus to a decisive battle: but that prince understood his profession too well, and had too distinct a notion of the superiority of his adversary's numbers, to enter into any hazard out of pure gallantry: he therefore kept firm to his post; nor were they able either to force his lines, or compel him to retire. By this time Arnheim grew indisposed (or made pretences rather of an indisposition, for he was the best dissembler in the world); and thus the command of the Imperial troops devolved on duke Julius of Sax-Lauenberg; and then on count Mansfelt.

Arnheim had displeas'd Sigismund, by refusing to attack the town of Marienberg, having no authority, as he alledged, from his court, to invade the territories of the elector of Brandenburg, who owned that part of Prussia. What his instructions were, cannot well be ascertained, but this is manifest, that his estate lay in the dominions of that elector; and there are reasons to suspect, that he betrayed the Poles, and advertised the elector privately of all their designs, so far as they bore any reference to him.

In this interval, Sirot made an attempt to force Gustavus's lines, which the king allowed to be a spirited attack, and undertaken like a man of service. The young Frenchman in the first place rendered himself master of an approach called Pozolar, where he defeated four troops of horse and two of dragoons, commanded by a brother of maréchal Wrangel, whom he killed. He next seized the dike of Elbin, and had stormed fort Osbron, where was only a garrison of fourscore men; but the water being high, and the fossé wide and deep, and having no portable bridge, nor scaling ladders, he sent to the new Imperial general for advice and assistance, who abruptly refused them both, and gave him positive orders to withdraw. In that interim two Swedish regiments, with some field artillery, arrived to sustain the fort. They handled

1629. handled the French baron rudely enough, (to make use of his own words) nevertheless he retired in good order, and with no considerable loss. The king then disposed his troops so judiciously, securing all passes, and bringing such plentiful supplies of provisions to his army, that Sigismund and the Polish generals had not power, after various efforts, to make themselves masters of an inconsiderable city called Stum*;

But the arrival of M. de Charnacé, the French ambassador, a minister more esteemed at home than abroad, soon put an end to this Polish war. He was a man of service as well as a politician †. Nevertheless Richelieu, who did not absolutely confide in his abilities, dispatched artfully to Gustavus, uninvested with any public character, the capuchin father Joseph, whom he called not improperly his political right-arm. De Charnacé made his proper applications to the two contending kings, and induced them to send their respective deputies to a conference. To this purpose tents were erected about 500 paces distant from each camp: but his Swedish majesty protested the conference should not proceed except he saw Sirot: so great a regard did he always pay to persons of distinguished valour.

De Charnacé having brought the treaty to a consistency, played his cards with a sort of shyness mixed with indifference, which put Gustavus partly out of temper, and partly upon his guard. Nevertheless, he made Gustavus an offer of a supply of money, assuring him at the same time, that the duke of Bavaria, and his confederates, earnestly besought the king his master to undertake the protection of Germany, and give a check to the progress of the house of Austria, whose power began to be equally terrifying both to papists and protestants. How

† Hercules, baron de Charnacé, was a colonel of infantry, and a captain of horse. He was the first public minister who gave the prince of Orange the title of Highness instead of Excellence, in the year 1637. He had always a certain abruptness in his manner; for when prince Henry-Frederic of Nassau modestly made him his excuses for omitting a certain enterprize, on account of the opposition that arose from wind and tide, he cut him short by replying; Sir, be pleased to remember, that there is no wind nor tide in France. At the siege of Breda, the same prince, by way of return, said to him, as he stood near him in the trenches: If you feel any uneasiness, let me beseech you to withdraw. Upon which De Charnacé kept his ground out of choice, and was killed by a musquet-ball.

far this assertion was literally true, in each of its branches, cannot distinctly be ascertained: yet thus much is certain, that De Charnacé had been dispatched to the elector of Bavaria some months before, with a view to reconcile him to the protestant princes, and detach him from the emperor; dexterously insinuating at the same time, that they, in conjunction with his master, would raise him to the dignity of the Imperial throne after the death of Ferdinand. But Maximilian did not chuse to make so desperate a plunge in politics all at once: nevertheless allowed certain oblique expressions to transpire, which tended to shew a certain disapprobation of the emperor's conduct, and a strong disgust to the king of Spain, who traversed him, to use his own expression, in all things*. He then harangued more at large on the ambition and insolence of Wallstein, and passed his word not to assist the emperor to the disadvantage of the duke of Mantua. From whence it appears, that though the elector had not courage enough to dismember himself at once from the house of Austria, yet it is plain he had certain inclinations to procure and cultivate a good correspondence with France, as will appear more distinctly in the sequel of our history. Gustavus had no dislike to this circumstantial detail, but still suspected that the French minister did not act sincerely and seriously with him. He had likewise a doubt if De Charnacé had any other views than to divine, if possible, what might be his future intentions. For these reasons he gave him some slight glimmerings of hope, and then returned him an answer conceived in vague and general terms.

But to return from this short digression. The elector of Brandenburg had his reasons likewise to dispatch a public minister, in order to bring the aforementioned treaty to an happy conclusion; and his Britannic majesty (successful by happening once in his politics to coincide with the inclinations of the contending parties) made use of Sir Thomas Roe in the like undertaking, who acquitted himself with good temper and distinguishing capacity. In truth, Gustavus had a great desire to settle a good correspondence with England, having conceived certain pre-occupations of good-will to the advantage of Charles I, 1629. who had honoured him with the investiture of the garter, and rendered him signal services before this period, in composing the disagreeable commotions that had subsisted between him and Sigismund, which in one word impeded diametrically the darling project of his life, namely, an invasion into Germany. Nevertheless, it was Charles's misfortune not to keep pace with Gustavus's expectancies; for inheriting a part of his father's pacific disposition, he at the same time spirited up Gustavus, and lent a kind ear to proposals of accommodation from the court of Vienna: and with a view to facilitate this project, dispatched Anstruther afterwards (who had been long the Britannic resident at Copenhagen) full freighted with conciliatory injunctions to the diet of Ratibon.

In a few days the treaty took effect, it being now the month of August *. It was to hold its force for six complete years: [at the expiration of which, in 1636, D'Avaux protracted it for one and twenty years more] and indeed it was high time, on the part of Sigismund, to conclude something, notwithstanding he demonstrated great unwillingness on the occasion †; for the kingdom of Poland was weakened and embarrassed to such a degree, that the king found it impossible to carry on the war with any tolerable success and reputation. These reasons induced him to connive at the mediating assistances of France and England: and it was agreed that the Swedes, during this period of reconciliation, should possess Elbingen, Memel, and Braunsberg, the fort of Pillau, and all the acquisitions Gustavus had made in Livonia. Two years and more before the expiration of which truce, his Polish majesty died, (six months and a few days before Gustavus) in the sixty-sixth year of his age, worn out with inquietudes and fatigues, after a reign of forty-five years, checkered with good and adverse fortune. His parts were rather acute than strong: he was enterprising, artful, and abundant in resources, and had the talent of struggling through misfortunes without allowing himself to be dismayed by them. Self-opinion and obstinacy were his greatest faults, and served to account

After this event of the death of Sigismond, nothing ensued of importance, except that another treaty was concluded betwixt Gustavus and the town of Dantzic *. But the first consequence of the truce before-mentioned, was the return of Arnheim and the Imperial army into Germany. It may be asked, why this general, with a body of 10000 † veteran troops, did not perform his duty better, and obtain greater successes? He was a man of artifice and stratagem, beloved by the soldiery at that period, and endued with great political abilities. But by the way, Arnheim, very justly suspected through the whole campaign, possessed no inconsiderable estate in the territories of Brandenburg, which gave him a disinclination to promote the war with intrepidity and vigour (for then the aforesaid electorate might have become naturally the seat of action;) and upon these occasions prince Vladislaus suggested his suspicions concerning him to his father Sigismond ‡. He was a creature also subjected to the ferula of Wallstein, who, like many other generals, had the self-denial to sacrifice his glory (great as that glory was) to his private passions and interests, his caprice and ambition. Wallstein (for reasons which must occur to every sensible reader) had no desire to bring this war to a conclusion by any decisive strokes; yet I must acquit him of having any personal views to a considerable degree, with respect to the private orders he gave Arnheim as to the campaigns of Poland; since the true interest of the house of Austria then was (coincidentally with Wallstein's interest too) to carve out just employment enough for Gustavus, without reducing either him or Sigismond to any certain and definite conclusions: for then they knew but too well (even though Gustavus had been forced to make a peace) that he would turn his arms against Germany, and in that respect France counterworked them, and over-reached them.

Mean while new circumstances in the Germanic system paved the way for an invasion more and more on the part of Gustavus; for it

1629. was now thought high time at Vienna to take off the mask a little with regard to the elector of Saxony, who had implicitly, without serious reflection, been its obsequious servant for many years, with a view to make some inconsiderable acquisitions in Lusatia and Bohemia, which the house of Austria, merely by dint of its superior greatness, had the power of refusing whenever she pleased. The event I am going to relate soon convinced him (though a weak man, who had been sold by his general and ministers many times before this period, and many times after) that the emperor had a mind to check him in his career, and give him a thorough mortification once for all, in spite of all meritorious passed services, and the alliance that then subsisted between them. To explain this point, it must here be known, that the chapter of Magdeburg, out of obedience to an Imperial proscription, in the beginning of this year had dispossessed Christian William, marquis of Brandenburg, administrator of the archbishopric, and placed in his room Augustus, third son living of the elector of Saxony; which young man was then aged about 15. But the court of Vienna, instead of ratifying this election in behalf of a family that had served its interests assiduously, (assigning no incapacity on account of youth) chose to make it devolve on the archduke Leopold, the emperor's second son*, who was born the same year with his brother-candidate. Mean while the see of Rome was previously applied to, and secured upon this occasion; and when a denial was returned to the elector of Saxony, he perceived forthwith that the court of Vienna could write two styles with equal energy; and that the title of prince ab utili (as the politicians then expressed themselves) had an interest in her infinitely stronger than all past assistance and obligations. This repulse consoled the landgrave

* This prince was not ill-provided with church-preferments, both in protestant and popish countries; for the archbishopric of Magdeburg and the bishopric of Halberstadt were supposed to amount each to 50000 l. per ann. and the income of the abbacy and territory of Hirschfeld was imagined to be half that value. But these were only a sort of commendams, to be preserved with his other ecclesiastical possessions. For previously to the present period he had been created bishop of Strasburg and Paf-fau, by the resignation of his uncle, the archduke of Inspruch, who had married the widow of duke d'Urbino. It was moreover intended to have procured for him, in course of time, the archbishopric of Bremen. He was also administrator of Murbach and Luders.

of Hesse-Cassel not a little; for he (who was half an enemy at least to the Imperial family) had lost the abbacy of Hirschfeld, which was made an appennage to the archduke aforefaid: and the elector of Saxony, an inviolable ally and friend of the emperor, met with a treatment just as harsh, conducted, from the beginning to the end, with as little ceremony and as much indelicacy. 1629.

His Danish majesty too began to suspect, as he possessed only one town, namely Gluckstadt, in the duchy of Holstein, that to support an equal balance of power in Germany, was a task beyond his strength and abilities. It was therefore he inclined a favourable ear to the treaty of accommodation which the emperor had announced to be held at Lubec; for a tedious and unsuccessful war had chastised his ambition more than enough, and as omens and disasters of prodigy in those days determined most men's resolutions and practices, it happened, whether fortunately or otherwise I cannot say, that a flash of lightning pierced the royal chapel of Copenhagen, and destroyed the funeral trophies of all the kings. Christian was struck motionless in his military capacity from that moment, and never afterwards recovered the use of his warlike faculties.

Mean while Gustavus, who above all things passionately desired the concurrence of his subjects, could not allow himself to realize his ideas concerning a German invasion, till he had first collected the sentiments of the good people of Sweden. But not caring to receive any public check in the senate-house by way of surprise, he conceived it most proper to assemble in his own tent the ablest men, civil and military, he then had round his person. It was there suggested modestly by one or two, who alledged they were not able to comprehend the effects of a war on the continent (whether through design, or from pure ignorance, I cannot say:) " That the revenues of the kingdom
 " had been exhausted in foreign expeditions: that it favoured too " much of punctilio and romance to support the interests of any " power, or espouse the cause of any religion on the other side of the " water: that a good king ought to stay at home, and not cross the " ocean in pursuit of feats of chivalry: that the dukes of Mecklen-1629. “ berg might be reinstated better by good counsel than by the dint “ of the sword : that the German electors were the best judges of the “ affairs of the empire, and best able to vindicate them : that the main“ tenance of the protestant religion depended on God, and not on “ man : and lastly, that as the sea was a natural barrier, sufficient to “ protect Sweden from all invasions ; so it likewise rendered every “ interposition upon the continent unseasonable, expensive, and in-“ fructuous.”
 " berg

It was observed farther, “ That the emperor had given the Swedes “ no lawful occasion for declaring war, though many insults had been “ offered them, and various injuries committed against them : that “ the troops sent to Sigismund were supposed to be hired by the re“ public of Poland ; and that this supposition might be rendered cre“ dible, if a nation chose to close its eyes a little, in order to obtain “ tranquillity and peace : that a sea-invasion against Sweden was a “ thing remote, and of a romantic nature ; and an irruption by land “ was alike improbable, since the kingdom of Denmark must be first “ subdued and reduced * ; and as to Livonia and Prussia, no attempts “ could be made there, but such as were incompatible with the Polish “ truce. The expences of a war upon the continent were next expa“ tiated upon ; nor was the immense power of the emperor passed by “ unnoticed ; nor the dispeopling of Sweden, nor the making conquests “ for other persons advantages ; the whole being concluded with a “ pathetic peroration, relative to the state of the kingdom, during the “ minority of an infant princess, in case it should please God to dispose “ of his majesty’s life.”

To these allegations and suggestions the king, and the major part of the assembly, replied to the following effect † :

“ That universal monarchy, even upon the continent, must be re“ pressed by neighbouring nations, at great hazard and inconceivable “ expence, provided such nations are only protected by a small inter“ position of ocean ; since a power of that encroaching and arbitrary “ kind must, in its own nature, make new and wider undulations “ strained : so that the fate of a country, removed at a moderate de“ gree of distance from it, is only res protracta, sed non sublata.”

 This preliminary being adjusted, it was observed next : “ That the “ Imperial troops were dispatched avowedly into Poland, and that if “ such insults and aggressions were timorously connived at, the cha“ racter of Gustavus would be given down to posterity in an ambi“ guous light ; for hostile actions carried more signification with them, “ than the disavowal of courts and ministers : that invasions from fo“ reigners, under certain circumstances, far from being objects of in“ difference, were matters of a very casual and equivocal decision : that “ Walstein, by the assistance of a Spanish fleet, then stationed at Dun“ kirk, had formed immense designs (to say the least of them) against “ the marine of Sweden ; and that the king himself, considered in “ the light of a man of courage and an intelligent being, had no choice
 “ of an alternative with respect to peace or war.” Yet still it was graci“ ously observed by his majesty, “ That he should consign his own glory
 “ and private sentiments unto the breasts of his senators, who, in a short “ space, should have full permission to debate publicly the expediency “ or inconveniency of invading the empire.” I know, cried the king with some emotion, as well as any one person amongst my subjects, the difficulty, the perils, the fatigues, and duration of such an undertaking ; yet neither the wealth of the house of Austria dismays me, nor her veteran forces. There are powers, even in the empire itself, who may not dislike the favour of a visit ; and I may venture to assert, that a certain edict has cast a damp upon the burning zeal of Saxony. It is moreover understood, that the Imperial army subsists by rapine and military exactions ; whereas on the other hand, though the Swedish revenues are not considerable, yet they are paid with punctuality ; and my soldiers are accustomed to temperance, frugality, and virtue. In the worst of cases my retreat is secure ; and my brave troops shall never want their daily subsistence, though it is transported to them from Sweden : and if it is the will of the Supreme Being, that Gustavus must die in the defence of his country, he pays the tribute with thankful acquiescence : it is a king's duty and religion both, to obey the

1629. great sovereign of kings without a murmur. I shall leave the world with a firm persuasion that Providence will support my subjects, because they are faithful and virtuous; and that my ministers, generals, and senators, will punctually discharge their duties to my child and people, inasmuch as they respected me, and loved their country.*

I own myself at a loss which to admire most in this debate, his majesty's abilities or his honesty; for as he had not actually settled any established agreement between himself, France, and England, though morally sure of effecting something on that head, he generously declined to have recourse to such persuasive and plausible arguments: and indeed it was always the cast of his temper, to preserve some resources by way of surprise, and perform more than he gave people reasons to expect. It was only for a man like Gustavus to quit this common department of the politician: and if Charles I. had thoroughly understood this exception in human nature, he would not have ruined, as far as lay in his power, the elector Palatin's cause, by insisting upon promises from Gustavus relative to the restitution of that prince, before he had power to realize them. The true policy had been to have trusted the king of Sweden, and suspected the rest of mankind; which incidental remark the reader will see verified hereafter, by the king's affection and regard for that unfortunate prince, at a time when his Britannic majesty gave over all concerns for his interest.

1630. It must be remembered, that this assembly was held in Prussia; and from thence Gustavus set sail for Stockholm, in which voyage De Charnacé attended him; and there he renewed his application to enforce an alliance between Sweden and France; but in such high terms, and with so great an air of indifference, that men of sense suspected Richelieu (who had been made secretary of state and prime-minister long before) to want more to penetrate into Gustavus's designs, than to form any real agreement between the two crowns: for De Charnacé threw out his proposals in a manner so extremely general and unrestricted, that in every instance he seemed to reserve for his master a safe and uncontested opening by way of retreat: nor was he over-modest in the requisitions he made; for it was expressly requested by him, that Gustavus, upon entering Germany, should maintain an army of 36000 men, and oblige himself to continue the war, right or wrong, six intire years; for which services France should pay him annually 75000 l. sterling. Gustavus, conformably not only to right reason, but to the natural cast of his temper, treated every article of these conditions with an air of penetration and disdain: he chose not to enlist himself as a mercenary general upon so contemptible a stipend; nor was it pleasing to him to be excluded from the means of treating with the emperor, upon condition proposals were offered him satisfactory to his own honour and the protestant cause. He feared also lest the other princes and states, who courted his alliance, or might reciprocally be requested by him to enter into engagements, should neglect, contemn, or think ill of his friendship, when they knew him to be engaged by France to carry on the war in the empire, at all events, for a limited number of years. A further difficulty yet remained; De Charnacé had forgot to envelop his sentiments in such clouds of obscurity, as certain politicians have always the power of creating; consequently Gustavus penetrated through the thin disguise, and saw plainly that France, whilst she employed him for a certain number of years irreversibly in the empire, had a private view to make an advantageous peace with the emperor in Italy. For these reasons the present negotiation was suspended; nevertheless, not to crush it absolutely in its precarious existence, the secretary Nicholai was sent to Paris, to insinuate dexterously, that Gustavus had no disinclination to an engagement, where the conclusions were reasonable, and not inconsistent with his welfare and dignity.

During this interval, De Charnacé set out with a view to revisit France, but received orders at Copenhagen to embark again for Stockholm, with fresh instructions (as it was generally thought) relative to a new confederacy in respect to the invasion of Germany*; and thus matters were conducted to a more successful conclusion.

* MS. letter from Sir Thomas Roe to lord viscount Dorchester, secretary of state, Feb. 14, 1629-30.

1630. It hath been asserted by Wassenberg *, an author of so great repute, that the famous count de Furstenberg published a commentary upon his history, that Gustavus, upon the proposal made him to enter Germany, placed so little confidence in French promises and subsidy-payments, that he insisted on his Christian majesty's sending seven hostages to reside at Amsterdam by way of security: and it was made a point likewise, that the republic of Venice should send two hostages on the same purpose to Stockholm; and the English and Muscovites should dispatch a certain number to make their abode in such places as the king should specify. But the states general were trusted upon their bare parole of honour: a mark of confidence which at that time they justly merited, on account of their sincere good-will to the unfortunate elector Palatin, and the protestant religion, upon all occasions then existing.

This matter being thus dismissed for a season, Gustavus at length proposed the final discussion of peace and war to the states of the kingdom assembled in senate. Various arguments were then alledged on either side, in substance much the same with those already related; but at length it was unanimously determined in favour of a safe and glorious peace, or a brisk and persevering war, without admitting any intermediate state of things by way of succedaneum. The senate then concluded with an earnest request to his majesty not to consent to a peace, except he had his helmet on †; requesting him at the same time to relinquish no present or future acquisitions, without maintaining in the highest degree the honour and glory of Sweden, the sovereignty of the Baltic, and the free exemption of the town of Stralsund; not forgetting the restoration of the dukes of Mechlenberg, and the re-establishment of ancient tranquillity in the two circles of Lower and Upper Saxony; keeping a strict and watchful eye to all alliances then contracted, or thereafter to be contracted with foreign princes, and the true preservation of the rights and dignity of the protestant religion ‡.

Upon this the states of the kingdom expedited a deputy to Walsstein

and Tilly, to whom his majesty dispatched also a couple of letters *. But when the person delegated, whose name was Nicolas Bielké, (lord justiciary of the country of Smaland) arrived at Stralsund, he thought proper, for certain reasons, to send his letters and a copy of his instructions to the respective generals, and complained with great acrimony against the violence of Walstein. It does not appear, that this arrogant commander had the politeness to return the king an answer; but Tilly made a reply with great respect, and modestly vindicated both himself and his party. The result therefore was, that the affair of Stralsund gave Gustavus pretensions upon the empire, and paved a foundation for him whereupon he might repose his hopes and preservation: for it rendered him master of a sea-port alike commodious for advancing or retreating.

And now openeth a great prospect, that is to say, the invasion of Germany; and since this point may be justly considered as the most important event in European history, it appeareth here highly convenient, once for all, to form a short but distinct notion of the state of the empire, for a century preceding, and something more, with respect to its religious, civil, or military commotions.

Previously † to the Bohemian troubles in 1618, about an hundred years, (almost to a month) Martin Luther, professor of theology in the university of Wittemberg, began to dispute publicly against the abuses of indulgencies; and Ulric Zuinglius at the same period declaimed from the pulpit against the aforefaid abuses. The doctrines of Luther in general were extremely relished by the majority of mankind; and he found moreover an excellent patron and protector in Frederic the Sage, elector of Saxony, and John the Constant, his brother. This was that very Saxon elector who, in conjunction with some other states, protested against the Imperial decree in the diet held at Spire, in the year 1529, from which action the name of Protestant first took its rise. After that a confession of their faith was presented to the emperor Charles V. ‡ at

The elector of Saxony, and Philip landgrave of Heſſe, were the chief perſonages in this confederation. But Francis I. king of France, Henry VIII. king of England, (who had publiſhed a treatiſe againſt Luther, upon the ſubject of the ſeven ſacraments, which procured him the title of Defender of the faith) and the king of Denmark, all aſpired to obtain the good graces and amity of the confederators at Smalcalden. M. de Bellay concluded a treaty with them at Eſſinguen in 1532; and it was then ſuppoſed in France, that a political ſtep of this nature would create the means of giving an oblique check to the immense power of the emperor. Yet the new religion unhappily performed that, which the enemies thereof could not effect; for the two communions of Lutherans and Zuinglians (or as ſome affected to call themſelves, Helvetians) had the prince, and ſome traditional ſchemes and ſayings of his, that had been delivered down to poſterity by uninterrupted ſucceſſion. The potentate in queſtion, the moſt powerful and illuſtrious of all the ſucceſſors of Charlemagne, trained up to great enterprizes, firſt by Perrotet, and then by cardinal Granville, conceived the high idea of becoming ſole monarch of Europe: a title the Auſtrians and Spaniards at that juncture greatly wiſhed to ſee realized! They well foreſaw the difficulties which the princes and ſtates of the empire might throw in their way, and of courſe made the grand attempt to divide them, under pretext of extirpating the doctrines of a Saxon profeſſor. This expreſſion of pretext I purpoſely make uſe of, in aſmuch as it was in their power, many years before, to have given the death ſtroke to the Lutheran cauſe. For ſome writers have thought that Charles V. granted more favours to the proteſtants by the pax religioſa, than an abſolute religioniſt could be thought to have done, and have ſuſpected (though perhaps without foundation) that the conference at Worms had made ſome impreſſion on his mind, and wrought therein no inconfiderable change: for when the Spaniards in the Smalcaldic war, on the ſurrender of Wittemberg, after the defeat of John Frederic, elector of Saxony, deſired permiſſion from him to dig up the bones of Luther, and burn them, he replied with great emotion: "Leave the man in peace, I have no inclination to behold him again, having ſeen enough of him in the diſputation at Worms." And what confirms the matter ſtill farther is, that his laſt words were reputed to be theſe: In ſolis meritis Chriſti conſiſtā *.

misfortune to disagree in the very infancy of reformation. At first the difference was slight, relating to little more than some insubstantial disagreements in the article of the Holy Supper; but after the Helvetians had adopted the doctrines of Calvin, the separation proceeded to greater lengths. It was the custom of the age to surname this latter party Calvinists, but for their own parts they chose rather to be dignified with the title of the Reformed.

At length the reformation made surprizing advances in neighbouring countries; Gustavus Vasa established it in Sweden, and Albert of Brandenburg, first duke of Prussia, embraced it likewise. Christian III. king of Denmark, caused the Doctor Pomeranus to come from Wittemberg, in order to establish the new religion in the North. This ecclesiastic performed the ceremony of his coronation, and composed a liturgy at that time, which is made use of to this hour in the coronation of the kings of Denmark.

About the same time, and with a motion almost as rapid as lightening, the reformation disspread itself over all Prussia and Livonia, as also over Poland, Lithuania, and even Bohemia, Hungary, Transylvania, Austria, and Carniola.

On the other hand it made its progress with the like rapidity through the Low Countries, but was attended there with great commotions and disturbances (which took their rise from the anabaptists); and then forced its way into the dominions of France, where Calvin threw it into a new mold.

The court of Rome discountenanced all discussions upon this subject; and the popes persisted in one uniform tone with Charles V. which was, to crush the protestants in Germany by meer force of power. But the emperor was not of so turbulent and sanguinary a temper, and had reasons besides for dealing more mildly with the protestants, and more circumspectly. He had a long and disagreeable war to sustain against Francis I. and the grand signior had no less scheme in view than to ravish Hungary from the emperor's brother, Ferdinand I; in prosecution of which, he threw all Germany into an alarm, by investing the city of Vienna in 1529.

Mean

1630. Mean while the emperor, and many other catholic soveraigns, requested a free council of the popes, but unsuccessfully. Perhaps his Imperial majesty might have done better to have convened a national council by way of succedaneum: but that not being the case, at length pope Paul III. exhibited, what may justly be termed a farce or interlude to all Europe, a convening the assembly of Trent, which was supposed to represent an œcumenical council: but the protestants kept themselves upon their guard, and were not over-reached.

That being the case, the emperor, after the conclusion of the peace at Crespy in 1544, found himself in a capacity to turn his arms against the confederates of the Smalcaldic league, and two years afterwards published an Imperial proscription against the two principal personages concerned therein, namely, the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse. He then defeated the elector at the famous battle of Muhlberg, April 24, 1547, and took him prisoner: commanding that day in person, though extremely incommoded by the gout. Yet so great was this prince's passion for glory, when placed in the balance against other sentiments, that he transferred the electorship of Saxony to prince Maurice. And hence it is that the electoral dignity is passed into that branch of the family which is called Albertin. Mean while the landgrave, in order to obtain his pardon, was obliged to come to Halle and perform the ceremony of genuflexion at the emperor's feet, who still detained him prisoner, though Granville his great chancellor had given strong hopes to the contrary. Hence arose a new war; and this may be called the most shining epocha in the reign of Charles V. Inasmuch that a suspicion hath arisen in many minds, as if he intended, after the reduction of the protestants, to have given a new cast to the form of the empire.

Be that as it will, it grieved him particularly to have made his brother Ferdinand king of the Romans; since thereby he precluded himself from having the power of associating to the empire his son Philip; a young man whom history might have pronounced fortunate, had he chanced to inherit his father's genius! But soon afterwards he acted an unbecoming part in England upon espousing Mary, who had just then succeeded her brother Edward, and in the transports of enthusiasm overturned that reformation, which his brother-in-law had taken care to introduce. 1630.

But at that very time, when the emperor Charles V. concluded himself sovereign disposer of the fortunes of all the protestants in Germany, Maurice, the new elector of Saxony, formed a fresh league, in order to secure the liberty of religion; and Henry II. king of France, who had lately succeeded his father Francis I, availed himself of this critical conjuncture with a view to make a powerful revulsion, and of course concluded with the confederate princes the famous treaty of Chambor. The elector of Saxony marched an army suddenly against the emperor in 1552, who at that time was without troops in the country of Tyrol, and suspected nothing. His escape was fortunate; for the confederates missed little of surprizing him in the city of Inspruck. Mean while Henry II. declared war against him, and surnamed himself the protector of the Germanic liberty; a title the French kings have ever affected to assume since that period! As if there was an opiate in the fount, which might serve to lull the empire to such a degree, till it dreamt itself into a state of slavery!

At the same time the princes of Farnese took the alarm in Italy, and cloathed themselves in armour: infomuch that the emperor, perceiving himself embarrassed on all hands by a series of revolutions quite unexpected, concluded immediately a truce at Passau with the protestants, in order to employ all his forces against the king of France.

This truce was at length succeeded by the peace of religion *, agreed upon at Augsburg, anno 1555, in a general diet of the empire, wherein Ferdinand king of the Romans presided in the absence of the emperor his brother, who employed himself at that time in the Low Countries, having already planned out to himself the scheme of relinquishing the

* The most essential article of this pacification was, "That no person thenceforwards should be prosecuted in the Roman empire for the sake of religion." The treaty itself, commonly called the pax religiosa, was concluded in the year 1552, between the emperor Charles V. and the elector of Saxony; to which the elector of Brandenburg and the landgrave of Hesse, &c. were admitted parties. It received a renson three years afterwards at the diet of Augsburg, and consists of thirteen general articles; of which the reader may peruse a clear distinct abridgment in Brachelius, Hist. nostr. temp. 12°. 186, &c.

And here it must be observed, that the peace of religion did not then extend itself to doctrinal points; it established only a full and fair equality between papists and protestants in rebus civilibus: and of course the latter were left in quiet possession of all the bishoprics and other ecclesiastical benefices, with which they had invested themselves till this period. Nevertheless, king Ferdinand inserted one clause at the solicitations of the catholics, which was, “That whenever a prelate of the Romish persuasion should think fit to embrace the protestant communion, he should then be obliged to relinquish his benefices.”

This short clause is called the Reservatum Ecclesiasticum; and hath been considered by the Romanists as the bulwark of their church. The protestants exclaimed aloud against this perplexing limitation, and with greater reason, as it happened to be inserted contrary to their knowledge, and without their permission*. Thus a few strokes of the pen gave birth to innumerable discords, altercations, and intestine commotions, which were never truly composed till the peace of Westphalia.

When the prelates arrived at the council of Trent, they had no inclination to enter into debates in the neighbourhood of a respectable army; and making these appearances a pretext for withdrawing, retired to their respective homes April 22, 1552.

France extracted no small advantage from the wars and confusions then subsisting; for she procured the possession of Metz, Toule, and Verdun; and the delicious taste of these three little morsels quickened her appetite to such a degree, that she at length swallowed down the three respective bishoprics that appertained to them.

The council of Trent assembled a third time in the year 1562, and published its decree the year ensuing. But, in spite of all the anathe-

* As the protestants had never interest to procure this clause to be expunged, a fresh one was inserted by way of counter-balance at the treaty of Munster, whereby it was stipulated,

mas then thundered out, the emperor Ferdinand * confirmed the peace of religion throughout the empire, and the number of protestants augmented under his reign, and those of his successors Maximilian † and Rodolphus II ‡, in the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia, and in all the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria in Germany: and the latter prince in particular granted some notable privileges to the protestants of Bohemia, and the annexed provinces, under the title of Literæ majestatis.

* This prince, brother to Charles V, in all but what related to the Reservatum Ecclesiasticum, discovered no outrageous spirit against the protestant religion, and was pleased to say, a short time before he died, that he had laboured to compose the animosities between Christians, and had attempted to compel no man to believe contrary to his private sentiments. What confirms this is, that he and the elector of Saxony agreed very well in their general opinions, and his ambassador at the council of Trent gave attention to the marriage of priests, and the communion under both kinds: so that the council in general appeared to be much better satisfied than his holiness the pope. Motifs pour la guerre d'Allemagne, 96.

† Maximilian, successor to Ferdinand, decently observed all the forms of popery; but there are reasons to think his heart had no insuperable disinclination to the opposite religion: for the protestants owe to this prince the favourable constitution granted them 1577, in which he disposed of all their Bona Ecclesiastica, in a manner contrary to the sentiments of his own party.

‡ Rodolphus, brother to Maximilian, behaved well to the protestants, even in the hereditary dominions. He allowed a Lutheran doctor to come from Brunswic and instruct such of his subjects as were of his persuasion. This anecdote was acknowledged by the Imperial minister, count Lamberg, and others, in his own house, at the congress of Osnabrug, 1648. From which series of remarks, by way of notes, it appears plainly, that the house of Austria was never so sincerely bent upon becoming absolute, as at the time Gustavus thought fit to enter the empire.

Under these above-named emperors, the court of Spain had no great ascendant in Germany. The two first were its concealed enemies more or less; and Rodolphus, piqued at the infant's being given in marriage to archduke Albert, his brother, always maintained a secret hatred to Spain, notwithstanding he had been educated in the court of Philip II. These resentments continued so strongly upon him, that some years afterwards he gave the Spanish ambassador a box in the ear, and banished him from his court, for making a very petulant and lively remonstrance to him: and this Volmar, the Imperial plenipotentiary, confessed at Nurenberg to the French minister.

During all this period the crown of Spain received no considerable assistances from the emperor or the empire. But matters took another turn in 1612, when Mathias ascended the Imperial throne. Good correspondence and intelligence was immediately formed between the two courts; and the ambassador of the latter soon found means to create and foment divisions in the empire, upon the plan of Charles Vth's memoirs, and wakened the sleeping fires in Bohemia to their full activity, by discovering the uneasiness of the protestants, and then exhorting the court of Vienna to pursue the most arbitrary and persecuting methods of reducing them to obedience. Thus, by administering breath to a few latent sparks, a furious flame was raised, and the conflagration did not cease in less than thirty years. [Motifs pour la guerre d'Allemagne, 96, &c.]

1630. Queen Elizabeth not only re-established the reformation in England, but supported it likewise in France and the Low Countries, where the indiscreet zeal of Philip II. paved the way for those future revolutions, which administered a series of opportunities, all tending to the dismembering and enfeebling of the house of Austria; whilst, on the other hand, the love of liberty took root imperceptibly in the United Provinces, and derived its chief support and nourishment from the treaty of Utrecht concluded in 1579.

But in France the reformed religion made more rapid advances, and missed little of ascending to the regality in the person of the king of Navarre. But the particular league, so much talked of, compelled this prince at length to pay his attendance at mass in the commencement of the eighteenth century*.

Soon after the tempest began to thicken all over Germany, in a very formidable manner: for the protestants being alarmed at the persecuting spirit of Ferdinand II, to which the Spaniards took care to administer fuel, and dreading extremely what a person of so furious a temperament might undertake, whenever he mounted the Imperial throne, had the precaution to combine themselves under the denomination of Unionists; and on their parts, in order to counter-balance the machinations of the papists, formed an immense project, which had the appearance of extirminating the Austrian princes from the empire, or depriving them at least of the better part of their dominions. This astonishing revolution broke forth at Prague in 1618.

But their expectances from England, France, Holland, and Denmark, all proved fallacious, or unavailing. James I. hated king-making, and had an aversion, as the foreigners tell us, to a drawn sword. The protestants in France were soon depressed, and had the power of contributing nothing, except their good wishes and their prayers. And the catholic party there overturned the union by their intrigues; for that kingdom, at the period I am now speaking of, under the ministry of the constable Des Luynes, by a contrast of politics remarkably singular, cultivated the friendship of the Spaniards, and advanced their interests.

* Memoirs communicated,

Thus the Austrian affairs being arrived to the very zenith of power, 1630. out came, almost at one stroke, the fulminatory edict of restitution, which founded afresh the alarm to war, and carried it to the amazing duration of thirty years. In the various edicts published by the court of Vienna on this occasion, it was expected by the emperor, that the reformed had no title to be comprehended in the Pax religiosa, and that the protestants in general ought to restore all the ecclesiastical possessions which they had appropriated to themselves ever since the conclusion of that treaty; and this single step brought the great Gustavus into the empire.

I shall now attempt to describe in a few words the situation of things at this important period. It appears from what hath been premised, that the house of Austria had continued in the highest splendor ever since the time of Charles V. At this important juncture, she was mistress of Spain, Portugal, the treasures of America, the Low Countries, the Milanese, the kingdom of Naples, Bohemia, the incorporated provinces, Hungary, its own hereditary dominions, and, to a certain degree, of all Germany: so that if so many states had united under one chief of that family, there is reason to think that the protestant religion must have been exterminated, and all Europe enslaved. And the house of Spain, at that time, considered itself to be all powerful; since in a Latin manuscript memorial*, or letter, which I have in my possession, addressed to Louis XIII, it is there said, that his Catholic majesty, Philip IV. had the presumption, and one may add the impiety likewise, to place this lemma under his insignia, SINE IPSO FACTUM EST NIHIL; which expression, if it doth not border on blasphemy, the reader must judge; for it is applied eminently and deservedly to our blessed Saviour by St. John. The emperor too, by means of his own proper forces, and those of the catholic league, had by this time crushed every prince and state that presumed to oppose his ambitious designs. He had reduced Bohemia and the annexed provinces after their revolt, and 1630. had constrained their unfortunate prince not only to relinquish his new kingdom, but his patrimonial territories: for after a mock-reign of eighteen months, the decisive battle of Prague un-kinged him, and sent him to seek his bread and his fortunes in other countries, since his English father only supplied him with peaceable advice and scholastic quotations, instead of money and legions.

Upon this the emperor doled out in parcels the dominions of Frederic to several potentates that were in his interests. But the greater share was transferred to Maximilian, elector of Bavaria, as the person among them the most respectable in rank, and the most considerable in point of services. To him therefore was consigned the whole Upper Palatinate (excepting only a trifling part) and the electoral dignity. Alarmed and astonished at these transactions, his majesty of Denmark formed an alliance with some German princes his neighbours, and commenced a fresh war against the house of Austria, which proved upon the whole so unsuccessful, that he was obliged to accept such conditions of peace as the Imperial party thought fit to prescribe: and Ferdinand on the other hand, elevated with such a series of prosperous events, [which gave him pretext to raise a very considerable army, and pretences to continue the same army on foot, with appearance of extirpating his enemies, and maintaining a general peace throughout the empire] determined to develop to the public, the mysterious object of all his wishes, which, though many suspected, yet few positively believed. And in order therefore to place such princes as were supposed to entertain unfavourable ideas of him, beyond the bare possibility of obstructing his future designs, published the ever-memorable edict; which, joined to the insolence, outrages, depredations, and depopulations of Wallstein's army, that lived every where at discretion, and made but a barely perceptible distinction between friends and foes, alarmed even the catholic powers, as well as the evangelical; for the former began to perceive at length, that the plan formed by the house of Austria was too exorbitant, and likewise too tyrannical: for Wallstein is said to have drawn 300,000 l. sterling from the electorate of Brandenburg

only *. Nor did George William himself (the prince then reigning) 1630. greatly relish the edict of restitution, inasmuch as it portended no less than an annihilation of the bishoprics of Brandenburg, Havelburg, and Lebus †.

In support of this remark, it may be worth observing, that the elector of Bavaria himself was not devoid of suspicions and jealousies, who (indeed principally on his own account) had thought fit, by one and the same stroke, to preserve the emperor, and secure to himself that delicious morsel the Higher Palatinate. Here he wished secretly to stop; but as such a check appeared to be rather too bold and abrupt, he contented himself with clogging the wheels of the Austrian machine, by projecting at a distance, the disgrace and ruin of Wallstein, and paving the way remotely to an under-ground intercourse between the courts of Munich and Versailles. And as he was the most refined and mysterious politician of any prince in those days, he made one ulterior attempt of ambiguous appearance, but of positive decision; for under the shew of prudence, œconomy, and not giving any undue umbrage to the protestants, he induced the court of Vienna to engage itself in an enterprise, much more prejudicial to her project of absolute power, than the removal of Wallstein could be; and that was, to march 30000 men into Italy, in order to take possession of Mantua and Casal in the Imperial name, as also to disband a veteran corps of protestants, who fought under the Austrian banners (for this prince with all his policy was a determined bigot by profession): and lastly, to pare away something from the immense number of the catholic forces, since a less suspicious quantity of foldiers was sufficient in all conscience to give laws to the empire at that conjuncture; which we will acknowledge to be true, if such a cotemporary prince as Gustavus had not happened to exist: but whether Maximilian privately wished for his interference, or whether he over-looked him or despised him, (as a person so very remote from the Germanic system) is more than I can take upon me at this distance to determine. Be that as it will, the Imperial forces and those of the league, which consisted of 125,000 men, were reduced 1630. (garrisons excepted) to about 70000 combatants; a quantity of soldiers sufficient to have enslaved the empire at that time, if unforeseen accidents had not happened to interfere.

On the other hand, the neighbouring princes and states took umbrage at the immense and ambitious projects of the house of Austria, and after various reflections, in consequence of the ill success that had attended his Danish majesty's irruption into Germany, found no person upon whom they could repose their hopes but Gustavus: and him they were obliged to extricate from that disagreeable war which engaged him in Poland: for the fate of Europe seemed to depend upon this one political negotiation: and as all parties, without consulting each other, were convinced his Swedish majesty alone could perform the task, England, Holland, and France, alike interested themselves in proposing an accommodation. The last more particularly, as she was nearest in situation to the emperor, and most a rival to him in power: and the rather as Richélieu, who then sat at the helm, and directed the whole political machine, had adopted the system which Henry IV. formerly devised, of humbling and debasing the house of Austria. A system France, since that period, hath contrived to execute too successfully!

The Swedish and Austrian parties at this critical conjuncture both sought the assistance of the king of Denmark: but that politic and wary prince, long exercised in misfortunes and disappointments, expressed a desire to continue neutral; for in truth the emperor had terrified him half out of his senses on the one hand, and he had conceived a cold and invidious jealousy of so powerful and enterprising a neighbour as Gustavus on the other hand.

And here it may be asked by some persons, how far, and in what respects, the present commotions may be denominated a war of religion? As Gustavus was a prince who had a vital and sincere affection for the preservation of the evangelical doctrine, it is not to be doubted but that these ideas made some impression on his mind; but upon the whole I think it is certain, that he would have opposed the domination and arbitrary views of the house of Austria, even if she had made profession profession of the protestant belief : so that I have been prompted sometimes to think, that religion had less to do upon the present occasion than is commonly imagined, and that it was only a sort of half-pretext : as the electress Palatin, Louisa Juliana, (no inconsiderable states-woman) used always to assert. 1630.

Nor must I here omit, that the people of the cabinet constantly kept peace with the men of the sword : for previously to the breaking out of the Bohemian troubles, the protestants had violent suspicions that the Imperial court, then supposed to be under the influence of the jesuits, had a mind to violate the grand pacificatorium of Passau, and erect itself by degrees into an universal monarchy. With a view to give death to these insinuations, the elector of Bavaria, after the battle of Prague, ordered his jus-publicists to set forth an impression of the Anbaltine Cancellaria : (a collection of state-papers found amongst the plunder of the prince of Anhalt's baggage, which were alledged to contain no less designs, than to extend protestantism from the Baltic to the Mediterranean *) to which a counsellor of the elector Palatin made a reply ; and one Keller, a jesuit, under the name of Fabius Hercymannus, printed a sort of rejoinder in behalf of the catholic side. Various controversies ensued afterwards : at length Camerarius, prime-minister to the said elector, (or next at least in consequence to the chancellor Grun) thought it high-time to enter the lists, and gave the public, by way of counterpoise, a Cancellaria Hispanica. Rusdorf afterwards bestowed the high finishing touches to what his master and preceptor in politics had left unaccomplished ; and that not only in his Vindiciæ Cause Palatinæ, but in his Cancellaria Bavarica ; a work I have spoken of elsewhere in the highest terms of applause. And whilst I have the former part of that performance in my eye, I cannot help observing, that the translation of electorates hath been three times unprosperous to the Imperial house of Austria. Once in the person of Charles V. who found no enemy more determined against him than the duke of Sax-Maurice, whom he had invested with the honour of the bonnet : once again in Ferdinand II. who

1630. having disobliged Walstein by transferring the Palatin dignity, and displaced him from his supreme command as general, in order to pay court to Maximilian of Bavaria, opened thereby an entrance to the sword of Gustavus ;—and a third time in a later instance, which bears no connexion to my present history.

These preliminary foundations of the state being thus adjusted, it may suffice to observe, that the protestant princes of Germany, in a manner indistinct and concealed, and with a sort of air, something betwixt distress and reserve, (for their terrors of the house of Austria were inexpressible) had besought Gustavus to make some advances in their behalf ; insinuating, that Ferdinand in general aimed at an absolute sovereignty over the empire, and intended to render the whole Germanic body hereditary in his own family. It was suggested likewise, that his troops occupied every territory, and committed depredations and outrages unheard of ; an Imperial garrison being lodged in almost every town of common importance : that religious and military persecution advanced by equal steps, and that princes, free cities, bishoprics, and ecclesiastical communities of all sorts among the protestants, were obliged, by the edict of restitution, to surrender all church-possessions ; which said edict then subsisted, and was carried into operation with the utmost rigour of severity. It was added farther, that his Imperial majesty had divested the dukes of Mecklenberg of their dominions (who by the way were nearly related to Gustavus) merely for presuming to take part with Christian king of Denmark, and conferred their territories on Walstein by his own plenitude of authority : and lastly, that he, to augment the number of the catholic votes, had annihilated that of Frederic elector Palatin, and created it anew in the person of Maximilian, elector of Bavaria, which made an alteration of two electoral voices in favour of the Romish religion.—It was then thrown out obliquely and at random, that both Saxony and Brandenburg had interceded with the emperor in behoof of Frederic their colleague, and declined long to acknowledge Maximilian in his new electoral capacity, inasmuch as he was chosen contrary to the orders of the golden bull (for no elector can be proscribed or deposed without the unanimous consent of the diet in body assembled :) but that the court of Vienna had paid no regard to these remonstrances. 1630.

Any person would naturally imagine, that a series of representations like these, voluntarily produced almost a twelvemonth before Gustavus entered Germany, would have induced a prince, even of a more diffident temperament than he, to have undertaken the enterprize, in hopes of a frank and vigorous co-operation from the protestant part of the empire: but great was his majesty's uneasiness, and still greater his disappointment, when he received no encouraging answers from the electors and other German princes for many months after he had addressed his respective letters to them; of which the substance in abstract was, "A clear induction of the injuries and motives which had tempted him to make an invasion into the empire: after which he besought each elector to use all his interest, and exert the whole of his address, to induce the emperor to restore things to their antient situation; adding, that any peace, except a weak and inglorious one, was preferable to a war supposed to be just in many respects. But if his Imperial majesty persisted to refuse him and his friends reasonable concessions and conditions honourable, he considered himself as purgated of all transgression before God and man, and was determined, for the sake of Europe in general, to support his own reputation and the cause of liberty and religion to the last moments of his life."

It likewise raised his indignation, to discover, that the terrors of the house of Austria had so far possessed his protestant well-wishers, that they durst not make use even of explicit terms, and had been so unbecomingly timorous as to omit the regal titles in addresses to him: for the emperor had the assurance to teach them to understand, that Sigismund alone was king of Sweden. Nor was he much less chagrined at his Danish majesty's conduct, who had not interfered one half so much as was expected, contenting himself coldly, after many remonstrances made, to have procured a mock congress at Dantzic, where the Imperial ministers rejected all accommodations in a very peremptory tone*.

1630. Yet Gustavus was not to be dismayed with a set of obstructions and retardments that arose from fear, rather than convenience, and never once losing sight of his object, pushed on conformably to his first plan, being well-convinced in his own private judgment, that these princes must join him, when he once came to make a shining figure in Germany; and that the king of Denmark would be obliged at least to observe a neutrality. Nay he took the alarm stronger when he reflected, that the house of Austria was determined to fix her footing on the other side of the Alps; and had no patience to consider how ill the generals of the kings of Denmark and Bohemia had acted, and how poorly their Britannic majesties had exerted themselves in support of the unfortunate prince last mentioned.

The king took some time (notwithstanding he was thoroughly exasperated) to return his answer to the German princes; “and reproved them with an air of dignity for the omission of his royal titles: titles, “said he, which I have received from God and my ancestors, and having maintained them with reputation for twenty years, will never be induced to relinquish even in the last moments of my life. He continued then to inform them, that he had once an intention to have re-sealed their letters, and returned them back, but that he perused them at length, and preserved them in his possession, merely upon a presumption that their amity should not be interrupted by any subsequent omission of the same nature. He then commended them for approving his earnest desires to effect a peace, and gently reprimanded them for not discovering their good wishes on that head; insinuating at the same time, that they must not be uneasy, if he sought elsewhere for such remedies as tended to preserve his own reputation, and maintain his allies and friends in a state of security.—But that he had no disposition to form friendships with his Germanic neighbours, provided satisfaction was made him for the extraordinary freedom lately taken: and lastly, that the affairs of Germany and the evangelical religion concerned them much more than they referred to himself.”

the protestant princes, and not secure of the co-operation of France. 1630.
 To the first point I have spoken already, that he expected their aid from a principle of convenience; and from the latter difficulty I hope likewise to extricate myself. For people who have a moderate knowledge of the subject of the history they undertake, and the characters of the persons concerned in it, may arrive at truth very often by the meer doctrine of verisimilitude. It may be remembered therefore, that we left the negotiation between Gustavus and the French ambassador upon a very abrupt and indecisive footing, and if we follow the general track of historians, we shall find no reconciliation of opinions till the conclusion of the treaty at Berewalt, in the month of January the year ensuing: yet still one cannot divest one's self from apprehending, that a prudent and politic prince like Gustavus would never have entered the empire till he had brought France to some degree of consistency, and for this reason, observed incidentally in the proper place, that the Sieur Nicholai was dispatched to Paris to negotiate something more reasonable and more practicable than what De Charnacé had proposed; and though nothing might be signed in the due form of treaty, yet it is manifest the substance and specification of articles were agreed upon under parole of honour. And though *Puffendorf, who writes professedly on the alliances between France and Sweden at this period, maintains a profound silence on the occasion, yet a Swedish historian † luckily steps in to my assistance, and says, that an agreement was made between the kings of the two respective nations, (it might probably be verbal only, upon the common principles of political good faith) whereby it was stipulated, that the former power for six years should allow the latter annually, either 66,000 l. or 82,500 l.; for the author pretends not to mark out distinctly the precise sum. Be that as it will, its destination was to maintain and carry on a sufficient war in the German empire. And about this period Sir Thomas Roe, in a letter to lord viscount Dorchester, regrets that a contribution of money was not given to the king of Sweden, with a view to facilitate an invasion of Germany, “ inasmuch as De Charnacé, the French ambassador, had 1630. “ made some offers to that purpose *. And in another † to Sir Dudley “ Carlton, nephew to lord Dorchester, and resident in Holland, observes “ more minutely, that De Charnacé had offered Gustavus 50,000 l. an“ nual contribution, attended with a commission to add 17,400 l. more;

 “ and that Mr. Meldrum, a Scots gentleman, was gone express to the “ king of England to carry the propositions of a treaty.”

What confirms me in my opinion, that the king of Sweden would never have ventured on a German invasion without establishing a good correspondence with France, is this, that preparatory to the grand design, he omitted not to impart his inducements and motives to most of the protestant princes and states in Europe, hoping thereby to obtain their assistance, or at least penetrate into their affections and inclinations. For these reasons he expedited Sadler (some time after the writing of certain letters above-mentioned) to several German princes, and then to the Swiss cantons; commissioning him in this latter respect to open the whole scheme, frankly and without reserve; and paint in proper colours, “ The justice of the undertaking on the one hand, and the “ necessity of counterbalancing the immeasurable greatness of a certain “ power on the other. That the Helvetic leaguers in particular ought “ to have for their object the restoration of German liberty, since the “ house of Austria had dormant claims to produce against them, which “ she would be ready to realize at the point of her sword, when other “ countries had been sufficiently chastized.—That attempts against man“ kind in general were to be repulsed by the united efforts of all.—And “ that his majesty hoped to behold with extreme satisfaction the resusci“ tation of the antient Helvetic spirit ‡.

But Sadler not being able to discover any correspondent operations of liberty in that mixed body to whom he was commissioned, (not to mention the reciprocal jealousies of religion intersecting and counteracting each other) and perceiving on the contrary a certain dread of the house of Auftria, mixed with fome attachments of convenience, judged it proper, like a prudent minifter, to make his private attempt here and there, and fuppreffed his very ample commiffion directed to the general affembly of the ftates. Neverthelefs Gustavus, indefatigable and undifmayed in all his follicitations, refolved to make a fecond attack upon the Swifs before he entered Germany; and difpatched the chevalier Rache, privy-counfellor, and counfellor of ftate, with orders to apply once more to the body of the league in general, and to fome proteftant cantons in particular. But this minifter had fo many political digreffions to make in the courfe of his journey, that he arrived not at Baden (where the thirteen cantons and their feveral allies were affembled) till the decline of the year 1631, of which we fhall fpeak more at large in its proper place.

Notwithftanding thefe difcouragements, Gustavus determined irreverfibly to maintain his point, having obtained the full confent of all the ftates of the kingdom convened at a final affembly at Stockholm. He there declared his wife regent of the kingdom, and his daughter Chriftina lawful heirefs of the crown; conformably to a preceding act of ftate made foon after her birth, with a view to mortify the king of Poland, and cut off his pretentions. It is true fome few fenators obliquely fuggested, that a prince fo paffionately beloved and honoured by his fubjects would do beft to continue in his own kingdom, and commit the war to able and experienced generals; in which they fhewed themfelves no very profound politicians, by judging fo ill of their mafter's difpofition and temperament of mind; who confuted them without hesitation in a fpeech equally animated and well-reafoned, exhorting them to bear in mind the bravery and conftancy of their anceftors, and returning them his beft thanks for their fervices, concluded with a tender and affectionate farewel. He then ftepped afide a moment, and bringing in his daughter by the hand, prefented her to the houfe in dumb fhew, which drew many tears even from northern eyes.

After that he delivered a manufcript treatife, of his own and the chancellor's compofing, to the ftates of the kingdom, containing directions in all fupposable matters of difficulty, in cafe the throne fhould become vacant; and joined to them by way of prefident (particularly in regard 1630. to the finances and the administration of justice) his kinsman prince John Casimir, count palatin of the Rhine, father to Charles Gustavus, who afterwards ascended the Swedish throne.

This body of laws, sixty-five in number *, was sealed up and repositied afterwards in the public chancery. I have a beautiful MS. of it in my possession, which appears to have been copied immediately after the ratification of the senate, June 29, 1634. This great work of Gustavus and Oxenstiern may be considered as the reduction of eventualities to one uniform system. Nor is it possible to place their political characters in a situation more advantageous. The packet, as I apprehend, received the following inscription on the outside, from the hand of the chancellor: REGIMINIS SUECICI CONSTITUTIO—QUAM REX INVICTISSIMUS GUSTAVUS SECUNDUS ET MAGNUS ULTIMAE VOLUNTATIS INSTAR REGNO POPULISQUE SUIS STATIONE HAC MORTALI FUNCTUS EXHIBENDAM VOLUIT. But be that as it will, we have thought fit to publish the extraordinary performance in our APPENDIX.

As Gustavus had received so many insults and injuries from the emperor, he dispensed with himself from declaring war in form; for he considered Arnheim's march into Poland as an express declaration on the Imperial side †. Nevertheless the invasion of Germany must not be considered as an abrupt and unceremonious attack; for Gustavus had given more than glimmerings of an hostile disposition against the house of Austria, by sending Sir Alexander Lesly to Stralsund the preceding year, and in the month of April of this present year, had ordered him, being then governor of Stralsund, accompanied by colonel Dewbatel ‡ and

* See the Appendix.

† This precedent may serve to shelter the English nation from the resentments of my good friend M. de Voltaire, who expresses great displeasure against our kingdom for commencing the present war, without publishing a formal declaration of hostilities: whereas the operations of the French in America, and the transactions of the Imperialists in Poland, are circumstances nearly if not strictly parallel: and the words of Loccenius, with respect to Gustavus, on this occasion, deserve well to be transcribed: Cæsari vero indicare bellum, rex non necessarium esse putavit: quum vim sibi ab eo prius haud denuntiatis armis, illatam arcere, natura ipsa permitteret; & hoc ipso satis denunciatum bellum a se esse crederet. . . . Lib. viii. p. 567.

‡ No one trifling circumstance in the present history has puzzled me so much as finding out the real name of this warrior; for we read promiscuously in all historians of Dewbattle, Tuzadel, Tubal, and some other officers of less note, to embark from Stralsund, and make a lodgment in the isle of Rugen*, where they soon drove Geetz, the Imperial commander, to the last extremity; who, after various unsuccessful skirmishes, was obliged to save himself by water to Stetin, and leave the whole island to the discretion of the Swedes. 1630.

Gustavus had a much finer army at this time than the world could well imagine. He had trained up a set of young generals (for few, except Oxenstiern, were elder than himself) who were all selected and chosen geniuses: each eminent for one or more distinguishing qualities: nor were his common soldiers novices, as some people vainly surmised, since the very Swedish forces had been seasoned by a succession of severe campaigns. But the major part of his troops were men of consummate experience, for he had gleaned up, at various intervals, all that was good in the dispersed armies of Mansfelt, duke Christian, the kings of Denmark and Poland, and the troops that belonged to the town of Dantzic. He had likewise 10,000 English and Scottish soldiers, all well-nurtured and experienced in the preceding services of the empire; a set of men he always principally confided in, conferring on them the glory of every

Tubal, Dubalt, Du-wall, &c. [As to Hanbald, he was certainly another person.] Yet after all this, his true name was not Doubalt, (though I call him so, in order to correspond with other authors) but Mac-Doughall; being descended from a Scottish father in the Swedish service and a woman of Lifeland. The king loved him extremely from the time he knew him in the capacity of a common soldier, making him colonel of his own guards on the death of Tenffel and governor of Ruffelheim. Being taken prisoner near Nuremberg, the Imperial general Walstein dismissed him without ransom, and entrusted him to negotiate an accommodation with Gustavus. Acquitting himself well in various commands of importance, he was at length betrayed by Arnheim in Bohemia, but Walstein released him generously, and demanded his ransom a second time. He then rose to be serjeant major general under the duke de Weymar, but forgetting the obligations he had to his deceased master, deserted the cause of Sweden at a period his assistances were chiefly wanted; becoming a fatal, but we hope an uncommon proof, that the brave man, and the man of honour, are not always to be depended upon each other.

* This island belonged to the duke of Pomerania. It is twenty miles square, and lies about two miles from Stralsund. It was infezled, saith an historian, rather than guarded by the Imperial troops; for Gustavus afterwards told the emperor by letter, who had accused him sharply of invading Germany, that he did not conquer the isle of Rugen, but only took possession of it. This island was confirmed to the Swedes at the peace of Westphalia as a distinct principality. The allies conquered it with great difficulty in the year 1715. But by the peace of the North 1720, it was restored to Sweden, very much shattered, and in extreme ill-plight.

1630. critical and trying adventure *. He had likewise, to a certain degree, the power of picking and collecting from the armies of Wallstein and Tilly ; for many of the Augustan confession chose to serve under them rather than starve, and a good number relinquished their party upon having received some injuries, either real or imaginary.

No troops were ever better calculated for service than the Swedish, being naturally brave and hardy, patient of fatigues, frugal, industrious, obedient, and sober ; verifying to the life the remark made by Vegetius ; Septentrionales populi largo sanguine redundantes, sunt ad bella promptissimi ; and another by Lucan,

And Tacitus applies this high idea of the strength and bravery of northern nations to the country of Sweden particularly, as a territory quod valebat viris & armis.

The whole dominions of this kingdom, at the time Gustavus possessed the throne, measured, according to some writers, about 1500 miles in length by 1000 miles in width : an immense tract of country, but not so well-inhabited, as there are reasons to conjecture it had been in the times of the ancient Goths, of whose populousness many manifest traces yet remain, even in the woods and forests, and of which more convincing proofs may still be produced by the four incredible emigrations made from thence into other countries. But an author who published an account in the year 1633, relative to the king's invasion of Germany †, tells us, that this kingdom, excepting only some remoter provinces, was comprized under the old denomination of Scandinavia, which vast peninsula, if one may be allowed to call it so, was supposed by Pliny to be a tract of land incomperti magnitudinis ; is at present imagined to measure length-ways about 1200 miles, and 540 miles in breadth. And here it must be noted, that under the designation of Scandinavia, are com-prehended the kingdom of Sweden, properly so called, and those of Gothland and Norway, excluding the part that belongs to Denmark. To which may be added Beärnia, Scrifinia, Lapland, Bothnia, Finland, Carelia, great part of Livonia, the town of Stralfund, and the island of Rugen. Thus stood the possessions of the crown, when the king of Sweden made his first appearance in Pomerania; and yet perhaps all these vast tracts of territory did not contain many more inhabitants than the kingdom of England singly*.

Nature seems to have formed the Swedes expressly for war; for they are brave, sober, patient, compliable, well-principled, and industrious; every common soldier being at the same time a peasant, a pioneer, and a mechanic. Gustavus had likewise more resources than could well be imagined, having a fleet, which contained above seventy ships of notable force, and being capable at a fortnight's notice to produce 40,000 chosen infantry, and a good body of cavalry, wherever he pleased; and, what was more, made them follow him implicitly. It is true, the horses of the country in general were small, but alert and vigorous. Nevertheless, his majesty, who was one of the tallest and most graceful personages in

* The kingdom of Gothland, saith the author last cited, which occupies the southermost-part of the peninsula of Scandinavia, is about 450 miles long, and 300 broad. It is divided into three parts, Estergothia, Westergothia, and Gothia meridionalis or Smaland: the first contains the provinces of Teuschia, Bravichia, and Kindia: the second, Dalecarnia, Vermland, Marchia, Falonia, Vofbogia, Ridvegia, Frochinnia, Gudhumia, Cachinnia and Warthopia; and the third, Verendia, Motingia, and the diocese of Vexo. As for the island of Gothland, it belonged to Denmark.

The kingdom of Sweden, stretching itself from South to North, extends 900 miles from the river Motala to the confines of Beärnia, and contains eleven dutchies, namely. Sudermania, Roden, Gestritia, Halfingia, Midelpadia, Angermania, Coperdalia, Westermania, Upland, Fieringia, and Neritia.

Scandinavia, divided from Sweden and Gothland by one continued chain of mountains, in most places inaccessible.

The province of Beärnia is the very northernmost part of Sweden.

Scrifinia lies betwixt Beärnia and Finomarchia, but advances something more to the southwards.

Of Lapland we shall say nothing, as Scheffer's history hath rendered it known to most readers: and Bothnia is a large province, which occupies the northern part of that huge body of water, which the Baltic ocean disembogues into the center of Scandinavia, commonly called the gulph of Bothnia.

Finland is a very considerable province plentifully peopled; Carelia is large, but not so populous; Livonia, Stralfund and the isles of Rugen are better known. Discours de l'Etat et Couronne de Suede, p. 5—59.

Matters being now advanced to a crisis, Gustavus determined to realize his intentions, and so far the rather, as the situation of his dominions removed him at such a distance from the house of Austria, that he had no reasons to fear any military reprisals from that quarter: for the Baltic ocean was spread between him and the emperor's generals, and as to naval strength he was greatly superior to his adversary.

He therefore published his grand manifesto once for all*; and caused it to be printed in Latin and German, in order to disperse it more advantageously throughout the empire: but though it was a very sensible and well reasoned performance, I shall not trouble the reader with a long declaration of all the causes, which induced our hero to carry this invasion into Germany; as many of the material ones have been already treated on in the course of our history. Nevertheless, there is something very solid, and at the same time not unartful in the beginning of it, where he insinuates, "That whoever lives near " a powerful and ambitious monarch, can enjoy peace no longer, and " in no greater quantity, than that monarch thinks proper to allow
" him."

The substance of it was to this effect: "That his Swedish majesty " had sincere intentions for the preservation of the evangelical doctrine:
" — that in the year 1625, his letters from Poland to Gabriel Bethlem †

* It is preserved in the Appendix.

† Such was that prince's true name, and not Bethlem Gabor, as the English historians affect to call him. For the Transylvanians place the surname after the Christian; and Gabor signifies Gabriel. If ever an unaccountable man deserved a note, it may be bestowed on this potentate, and the rather as he had many transactions with Great Britain. From a simple gentleman he mounted to the government of Transylvania, and from an insignificant portion of ground in the European system, negotiated at once with all the protestant princes and states, half the popish ones, and the grand signior into the bargain; ambitious, artful, reserved, and treacherous, who served all, sold all, and betrayed all reciprocally. Formed in the court of Gabriel Battori, he passed his life in arms from the seventeenth year of his age, and lived for some time at Constantinople. He had been present in forty-two battles; and often declared, that his circumstances were so mean, even when he was thirty years old, that a merchant of Cassovia refused to lend him eighteen pounds for want of security. He was affable, polite, intriguing, but capricious and mutable beyond imagination; talked Latin with tolerable fluency, and loved the society of men of letters. His memory was astonishing,

“ had been intercepted by the emperor’s means; that the matter of them “ had been shamefully misinterpreted, the contents falsely published, “ and the courier treated like a common criminal:—that the emperor
 “ had privately fomented the differences between him and Sigismund, “ and besides supplied his adversaries with great quantities of corn, and “ dispatched two armies with orders to act publicly against him in Po“ land; one conducted by Adolphus duke of Holstein, in the year “ 1627, and the other commanded by Arnheim in 1629, denying him “ at the same time the common favour of enlisting men in the empire:
 “ —that he had dispossessed his kinsmen, Adolphus Frederic, and John “ Albert, dukes of Mechlenberg, of their territories, without citation “ or trial, and bestowed them capriciously on Walstein through his “ own plenitude of power, unsupported by any concurrence of the “ Imperial diet:—that he possessed several havens on the Baltic coasts, astonishing, and nothing delighted him more than to reason about the reformed religion, which he professed. He took great delight in fine cloaths and jewels, copying the Hungarian fashion in the flowing length of his robes, and the short cut of his hair; but modelling his beard according to the French mode. His first wife, Carola, though well descended, proved the best œconomist then in Europe, for she was his head-cook, and kept the key of his Tokay; inasmuch as he had negotiated himself with the house of Austria into the possession of that vintage. On Carola’s decease, he married in his advanced age a young beautiful princess, sister to the wife of Gustavus, to whom he assigned three signories on his decease (in one of which grew the vineyard we have mentioned) as likewise 100,000 ducats, as many rix-dollars, and as many florins; which made in all about 77000 pounds sterling. He died in the fifty-ninth year of his age, having passed the whole time of his existence in one continued storm of his own creating. Nature, to make his distempers correspondent with his life, united a sort of contradiction in them; for he died of a dropsy and St. Anthony’s fire; a fine circumstance for the German poets, who value an an-tithefs more than a patrimonial fortune! And to maintain his inconstancy and capriciousness to the last, he bequeathed a fine horse, and 20000 pounds in specie, to his old enemy the emperor; the same sum to Ferdinand king of Hungary, and the grand signior, recommending however his young wife and country to his Imperial majesty.

He was ceremonious and jealous of his honour to the highest degree; for having dispatched an ambassador to the court of London, he gave him orders to make his appearance before the king without uncovering his head during the course of the audience; which punctilio created some confusion in the British palace.

In a word, his restless and turbulent spirit never allowed him to be idle a single twelve-month; for he was one of those princely tormentors of mankind, who love to poach in disturbed waters; no power of treaty-language could bind him; nor could even money secure him; since he either changed for the sake of changing, or flattered himself that he could always make a better bargain. I have seen letters from him to the cham of Tartary, where the rodomontade is a sort of comedy.

1630. “ and assumed a sovereignty over that sea, to which Sweden had a just “ claim from time immemorial, interrupting all commerce betwixt the “ subjects of that kingdom, and the inhabitants of Colberg, Gripswald, “ Rostock, Wismar, and several other Hanseatic and Vandalic towns, “ now enslaved by the Imperialists:—that he had confiscated the mer-“ chandizes of Swedish traders; attempted to throw all commerce into “ the hands of the Spaniards; and, when that attempt failed, had hired “ Polish and Dantzic ships, and made the Baltic a seat of piracy:— “ that the island of Rugen, which the Austrian troops had lately in“ vaded, had consigned itself to his protection conjointly with Stral-“ fund; and that in succouring the aforesaid town, he had done no “ more than his Danish majesty had shewn him an example:—that “ he had rejected Salvius the Swedish ambassador at the treaty of Lu“ bec, when a peace was negotiating between him and Christian king “ of Denmark:—and to conclude, had cast several neglects and af“ fronts upon him at the general assemblies of the empire, and de“ clared him, in so many words, a professed enemy to the Germanic “ system.”

As kings, whenever they have the condescension to oblige the public by their writings, are the fittest critics to pass a revision on the conduct of kings, it may be worth while just to remark here, that a supposed R—— historian treats this manifesto as a complete piece of monarchical sophistry. For my own part, I acknowledge myself at a loss to penetrate into the reasons, which induced so clear-sighted a writer, to pass so harsh and unlimited a censure: nevertheless, it may not misbecome a person like me to imitate the humility of an antient rhetorician, who did not chuse to engage in a dispute against the master of twenty legions.

At the time Gustavus prepared to embark, all men's eyes were turned upon prodigies. Chemnitius*, an historian of the very best credit, mentions

The second tome, which takes place after our period, was composed not only upon Oxenstiern's memoirs, but hath been imagined by some mentions some; but as the part of his work, which relates to the present period, was not composed directly under Oxenstiern's inspection, it is unreasonable to suppose the great high chancellor to have given implicitly into such a belief. Armies were beheld embattled in the air in various parts, and the very clashing of armour was supposed to be heard at Nuremberg. Three suns were seen at Ratisbon, and a foldier of Tilly's sweated blood very profusely, having no actual distemper, but complaining of a certain weight upon his spirits. And at Magdeburg (which exceedeth all) the feat afterwards of the most tragical scene in the whole thirty years war, a child was reputed to be born with boots and spurs of flesh, in dragoon fashion, and an helmet of the same materials, with two balls in a pouch of skin on the left-thigh. And all these circumstances, with numbers more, are related by historians, who, I believe, in other respects, would not have published a known untruth upon any considerations: but different ages have their periodical malady of believing too much, or believing too little.

And here one cannot but regret, that some few days after his majesty set sail for the empire, the intrepid and sensible politician Sir Thomas Roe, found himself obliged to return for London*; the absence of which statesman is greatly to be lamented by all admirers of national glory; for England behaved afterwards with no great reputation in respect to Germany.

His majesty left Stockholm at the head of 130 ships of different sizes, and, if some accounts which I have seen be true, divided the care of conducting the five several squadrons (for of so many his fleet consisted) between the land-commanders and sea-officers, reserving to himself the honour of being admiral supreme, and appointing lieutenant-general Banier (the person next to him in authority) to take the command of the third division. This enterprize of crossing the ocean some to have been committed to writing in the present form it stands by the minister himself, who gave Chemnitius [Bogislaus von Chemnitz] the honour of being its father. As far as I know, it hath not been translated, and was published at Stockholm 1653, making 1046 folio pages. The rest of the work is in the archives of Stockholm.

* By his own papers it was June 1, or 2, 1630.

1630. carried with it from beginning to the end a very disagreeable and unpromising aspect; for it was five weeks before Gustavus reached the shore of the isle of Usedom, being confined to one port for a whole month.

On the king's right-hand (for the fleet was drawn up in a sort of battle-array) sailed high admiral Gildenheim, who was natural son to Gustavus's father; and on Banier's left sailed the watchmaster-general of the navy; a small body of ships by way of reserve being conducted at some distance behind them by the vice-admiral.

His majesty had the foresight or good-fortune to reach Pennemond harbour in the isle of Usedom, just at the approach of evening, and was a little surprized to see the whole country all in a flame at one instant. Nevertheless, he ordered his infantry to debark in large flat-bottomed boats prepared for the purpose, assigning 200 men to each vessel, and two small field-pieces. It is to be remarked, that he piqued himself upon being the first person to set his foot on German ground, and taking a pick-ax in his hands immediately began to open a trench, ordering half the men to labour, and half to stand to their arms interchangeably. In this debarkation he made choice of the properest place in the whole island, it being a spot, where the Danish troops in the late war had thrown up an imperfect redoubt in the year 1628; and as this first step was of a very hazardous and critical nature, his majesty exerted so much industry and dexterity on the occasion, that he conveyed eleven regiments to shore, and took care to see them entrenched before break of day, near a small village, from whence the harbour took its name.

A second, but smaller division of troops he conveyed to Stralsund, and dismissing the fleet, commanded all the sea-officers to return to Stockholm for new supplies of provision and forage, being determined to oppress the inhabitants of the empire as little as possible.

There was one thing casual, yet not devoid of particularity, with reference to the time when Gustavus first set his foot in Germany, for it happened precisely that very day, upon which, just a century before, the confession of Augsbourg had been presented to the emperor Charles V.

Immediately on landing, after having given some short necessary orders to the generals that served under him, he retired a few paces from them and his men, and falling down on his knees offered up a most fervent prayer to the Supreme Being*; and then turning round to his officers, who some of them testified surprize in their countenances at so uncommon an example of piety, told them with an alert and chearful air, That a good Christian would not make a bad soldier. The man, continued he, that hath finished his prayers, hath completed one half of his daily work †. It was not indeed the king's first intention to land his army in the island of Usedom: he knew Rugen to be a larger and more fruitful district, and purposed to make it his magazine of provisions, and his sure asylum in case of a defeat. But Lesly made himself master of it beyond expectation, and joined his master with a part of the Stralsund cavalry, with his own and half Hall's regiment of infantry, and four troops of Dewbatel's horse ‡.

As this voyage had been protracted at least a month beyond the king's expectations, he frankly told his men, That as they were veteran soldiers, and had experienced hunger with him as well as plenty, he besought them to continue their patience for a short space, and he would soon subsist them well at the expence of their enemies. After which generous proof of affection and sympathy, not a single murmur was heard throughout the army; nor did the meanest soldier conceive a notion of plundering the inhabitants even for subsistence; well knowing, that he served a master, who, though he compassionated the hardships his troops might suffer, yet never could be induced to dispense with any infractions of natural justice and military discipline. It was upon this 1630. very occasion that Gustavus likewise told his men, That they must not be alarmed at the Imperialists, and consider them in the light of new antagonists, since they had fought with soldiers of the same stamp in Poland and Prussia; and that the sample and the piece were of one colour and one texture *.

And here it may be worth while for a moment to take a short survey of Gustavus's marine; and the rather, as the tribe of historians, like the herd of commentators, usually pass by these more curious researches and enquiries. This prince in general neglected nothing; and amongst other things kept an attentive eye to the sea as well as the land: for at the very period we are now considering, he was master of fifty fighting ships, from 20 guns to 40, and 6000 regular sailors, chiefly Finlanders, Angermanians, Dalecarlians and Hollanders; which made his power with reference to the house of Austria as indisputable in the Baltic, as it proved afterwards in the empire. The quantity of royal artillery was at that time amazing, except we consider the vast resources of metal in the Swedish mines. It is supposed by many, that Gustavus was owner of 8000 pieces of ordnance †. And under this same article it may not be improper to observe, that Sweden at that time supplied the king with a certain number of land-forces; for each province maintained a considerable body of regular troops, to which the modern reader may give the name of militia, or what other denomination he thinks fit. For example, Sweden, properly so called, and Gothland, supported at the least 16000 infantry, and 5500 cavalry, who, though fed by their respective provinces, were clothed by the king; received a monthly stipend from him, and paid for nothing but with an exemption of duties. It is true, this military constitution or establishment in times of peace was extremely frugal: for though each company of infantry contained at least 500 men, yet only one captain was assigned it, and one lieutenant, who received their raiment and food from the royal bounty. The captain had a salary of five pounds fifteen shillings a year; and the foot soldier had three shillings and sixpence per month. About one third more was allowed the cavalry : and every soldier made prisoner in war was to be exchanged, or redeemed at the king's expence. And here likewise it must be observed, that Finland, Livonia, and all other provinces, contributed towards the general system of a perpetual army, according to their wealth and tract of country in the same proportions. Thus Sweden under Gustavus may be considered as a true military government, like that of the Romans in their better days*.

Such an original basis of national forces having been thus established by the laws of Sweden, his majesty superadded to it out of his own revenues, and conformably to his own voluntary pleasure; and thus much is certain, that he hired and employed more foreign troops, than the contingents of his own dominions could possibly amount to: so that we may reckon his own army, at least during the three grand campaigns in Germany, to amount to 60, or 70,000 fighting men. And yet, though the revenues of Sweden could not be magnificent, this wonderful man neither borrowed money nor distressed his subjects, nor left behind him any one considerable national debt, notwithstanding all the treasure was spent abroad: nor does it ever appear that his army wanted pay a single month; nay, on the contrary, it was generally his custom to advance one third of pay on the first, eleventh, and twenty-first days of every month†.

There is a certain illustrious prince now in being, who copies Gustavus in this part, as well as many others, and who guides himself by facts and observations relative to him, which are not to be found in every page of a common history: and indeed Gustavus was one of those genius's which shine proportionably both in the great and the lesser degrees of excellency. Alike considerable, if circumstances could be supposed equal, as common soldier, financier and provider; or as an engineer, politician, and generalissimo: nor do I throw out these encomiums rhetorically and at random (the common method of adorning characters) but intersperse them occasionally as they rise from facts.

1630. Indeed it is impossible to ascertain what the revenues of Gustavus might be at this period, since my Swedish friends at the present moment profess themselves unable to afford me any warrantable informations. All we can learn from cotemporary writers is, that he had some royal demesnes, as well as a patrimonial possession*; that he had a sole right in particular mines, and a tenth from all; he had likewise some peculiar taxes appropriated to his own coffers, and the tythes of the kingdom, great and small, (as the ecclesiastics term them) including those of fish, cattle and furs; which latter, from Lapland especially, made no inconsiderable object; and in times of war new requisitions were made from the provinces †.

As to his men, the Swedes from the days of Tacitus were remarkable from their obsequium erga regem. Neither Roman nor Grecian invasions could ever reach them; whereas they, on the contrary, at various times over-ran all Europe with the rage and rapidity of an unexpected torrent. The soldiers of Gustavus were patient of cold beyond expression; nor was it uncommon for a centinel in extremity of winter to remain eight successive hours on his post without being relieved: but the king took constant care to cloath them accordingly, and allowed each man, besides his regimentals, a long warm cloak of Swedish manufacture, lined with Lapland fur. There was another unspeakable advantage in Gustavus's army; for every person was his own tradesman, his own artizan, and his own mechanic. And hence it happened, (to name only one particular instance) that when the king wanted to erect his extemporaneous bridge across the Lech, he had 2000 very tolerable carpenters amongst his soldiers. It was the same likewise when pioneers were wanted, or in matters of masonry and fortification.

As to the cavalry, the Swedish horses were small but well figured, making up in velocity and vigour what they wanted in height and bulk; it being possible for them, relieved only by a slight refreshment, to keep in action forty continued hours. Nevertheless, as the size, weight and pressure of horses are of no small consequence in the day of battle, 1630. Gustavus generally chose to mount his troops upon such as were the produce of Germany and Denmark*. But what was equal to most other advantages, his officers both respected and feared him; for he saw their faults with a single glance, and drew conclusions from them with the greatest precision; and on the contrary, whenever they acquitted themselves well, he bestowed his honours, pecuniary rewards, and encomiums liberally: for I have not hitherto discovered (though the case be common even in the ablest commanders) that he ever considered any one general, that acted under him, in the light of a rival; nor destroyed a single man of consequence either through jealousy, or resentment, or the just ideas he had formed of military discipline, if we except only colonel Mitzval. But though his heart was equally humane to all persons upon every occasion, yet it is very certain his private maxim was, to be revered by his generals †, and beloved by his common soldiers: and indeed they devoted their hearts passionately to him, for no man balanced between certain death and the inclination of his master, who never made the meanest servant a sacrifice to his pride, his obstinacy, or his vanity. And perhaps one may judge of the temper of the soldiery from the slight circumstance I am now going to relate. The Livonian regiment of Denhoff had a standard of black silk damask, whereon Abraham's offering of Isaac was depicted with this inscription:

 “ Pro Rege sic nos parati sumus mori ‡.”

† This is corroborated from the idea, which De la Gardie, his general in chief and military preceptor, had formed of him: for when that commander was invited to a conference with the Czar, the Muscovite courtiers told him, he must leave his sword in the anti-chamber. “Gentlemen,” said he, “you may give countenance to such forms as you please; but the prince your master has had some obligations to this warlike instrument during the campaign wherein I assisted him by my sovereign's orders against the Polanders: and be the dis- appointment of the interview ever so great, no monarch upon earth shall make De la Gardie resign his sword, except Gustavus.” *Memorab. 1630. But to return to the present embarkation, his majesty contrived to bring with him ninety-two companies of foot, and sixteen cornecies of horse, (one half of which consisted of English, Scottish and German forces) which troops in those times, supposing them to be full, made about 13,800 men, whom the king in a month's time augmented to 20,000, if not more: not to mention 6 or 7000 soldiers which had been conveyed to Germany some time before, in order to re-inforce the garrison of Stralsund, and take possession of the isle of Rugen. And indeed it may be considered as an uncommon instance of prudence and precaution in his majesty to dislodge the Imperialists from this island; for as it lies contiguous to Usedom [between Usedom and Sweden] of course his retreat, if fortune had favoured the enemy, could never have been rendered secure, whilst Rugen remained in any person's possession except his own. But Lesly, the Swedish commander there, took care to assure his master, about the time he approached the German coast, that all things were reduced to his majesty's satisfaction, which determined Gustavus to advance to Usedom.

And here, in order to animate his army a little at first, the king gave his soldiers all the lawful plunder belonging to the Imperialists, and allotted a body of troops and two men of war to protect the island, being determined not only to make it his sea-port and magazine of war, but his sure retreat in case of misfortune or disappointment: and concluding it likewise highly convenient to refresh his troops, who were not a little fatigued with a tedious and disagreeable voyage, he had the goodness likewise to allow them two days uninterrupted rest, and in that interim contrived to land his horses and his artillery, as also ammunition, provisions, and military utensils. It was his next business to take particular care of the poor inhabitants; and having published a proclamation to assure them of the most perfect peace and protection, he distributed food and raiment to the hungry and naked: and thus by turns exercised the three glorious characters of an able general, a wise politician, and a good Christian; so that in the whole course of the war he injured the Imperialists as much by his clemency and generosity, as by his prudence and magnanimity.

Having taken these military and civil precautions, his majesty on the third morning made an excursion over the better half of the island, at the head of 1000 horse and 3000 commanded * musqueteers, in which expedition he drove the Imperialists before him without difficulty; for in truth they had no appetite to contest with him.

And here it may be asked not improperly, where Walstein was at this conjuncture, the command in these parts being his proper and respective department? To which question one may readily reply, That he employed himself at the present conjuncture in other matters of more immediate importance to his own well-being, first in Bohemia, and then at Memmingen, in order to avert the disgrace that threatened him at the diet of Ratisbon. — Tilly too, carefully declined to enter that military walk which belonged properly to Walstein, whom he feared on account of his ambition, and loved not by reason of his insolence and uncommunicative temper: for these reasons he chose to occupy himself in Franconia, and about the borders of Lower-Saxony, in giving the finishing stroke of reduction to the princes and states which had assisted the king of Denmark in the late war.

Or perhaps I may explain this passage more distinctly, by transcribing another paragraph from my original materials, where it is observed, that nothing could be better judged than the time which Gustavus seized for invading Germany. For though the house of Austria and the leaguers just before this period had an inconceivable number of veteran troops on foot, yet one part had been disbanded out of pure respect to the complaints preferred at Ratisbon; another army had been dispatched to form the siege of Mantua; Walstein lay inactive in the circle of Suabia (we mean in a soldier-like capacity) in order to watch the motions of the diet, where his ruin was meditated; and Tilly bent his thoughts on reducing the only rebel to the majesty of the empire, the Landgrave of Hesse, and bringing some parts of

* Commanded men, in the language of those times, were the better half of a regiment selected from their companions, and conducted by the respective colonel; so that in this particular the troops, upon enterprizes of importance, were doubly colonelled. We shall speak more of this invention of Gustavus elsewhere.

1630. Westphalia and Lower-Saxony into obedience; where he had grants given him of great possessions as a reward for his services; and particularly the lands belonging to that gallant youth Christian duke of Brunswic and bishop of Halberstadt.

Yet after all this, it is still surprizing, how many armies his Imperial majesty and his associates had then on foot, all well seasoned troops, accustomed to victory. The forces of the league, consisting of thirty thousand men, acted in Westphalia and Lower-Saxony under the command of Tilly, Pappenheim, and other generals in separate divisions.——A second body of troops nearly equal in number attended Aldringer, Colalto, and Gallas, in the Italian expedition, and all returned in a few months.——Montecuculi and Ossa, in conjunction with the archduke Leopold's forces, (making in the whole a body of ten thousand men) gave laws to Suabia and Alsatia, extending their dominion more or less from the Valteline to the town of Strafsburg.——Then their good allies the Spaniards took the lead, and dispersed ten thousand Walloons over the whole Lower-Palatinate and the countries adjoining.——The influence of the three ecclesiastical electors succeeded next, (who preserved about eight thousand men in their own territories) and thus a boom of conquest was stretched out from the source of the Rhine to the circles of Westphalia and Lower-Saxony, or, in other words, from the feet of the Alps to the shores of the Baltic, where Tilly and Pappenheim were supposed by all men to be next to invincible.

At the same time the interior parts of Germany secured themselves: for as the house of Palatin was by this time exterminated from its hereditary possessions, the other few protestant princes had submitted by agreement, or been dispossessed by force.

Nor was the eastern side of the empire dismantled of protection, though the elector of Saxony appeared not then disaffected to the Austrian interests, nor indeed was he; for Baltazar di Marradas commanded eight thousand men in Bohemia, where Walftein likewise was all-powerful, like a sovereign ruler; and Tieffenbach and Goetz conducted another army of the same magnitude in Silesia and Lusatia.——So that if any part was weak (and that we may attribute to the extraordinary sagacity and courage of the person that attacked it) it was the long extended duchy of Pomerania, and the shore of the Baltic thereto belonging: yet the duke of Pomerania was a meer shadow of power, being in effect a state-prisoner, and at best master of a few broken regiments; and as to the elector of Brandenburg, it is well known he was proprietor of no more than four or six thousand soldiers, not over well paid, and but poorly disciplined; whilst Torquato di Conti, at the head of sixteen thousand insolent and unmerciful veterans, had reduced either country to such a state of servitude, that the inhabitants durst not trust the idea of Gustavus even to enter into their private thoughts. Yet that great man, sure of no one German alliance, and expecting none, except from a consciousness of his own lenity, prudence, dexterity, and fortitude, had the astonishing resolution to cross the ocean, and fix his footsteps in a hostile empire, reposing all his hopes on the narrow basis of thirteen thousand eight hundred soldiers (for the garrison of Stralsund must not be computed as any real assistance, except under its own walls) wherewith to confront nine several armies, which (supposing those troops to be divided in eight similar portions) were each equal (if we except only a few men) to the whole force of his majesty at his first landing. And to the Imperial field-troops, &c. may be added likewise the Imperial garrisons; for in those days every town in Germany being more or less fortified, required a protection. So that in truth, the king had more than one hundred strong cities and fortresses to besiege; and though the moderns may say that the strength of a fortification was in those days nothing, yet at the same time we ought to remind them, that strength is a term relative to the arts of investing and attacking, which then subsisted; nor could Gustavus have conquered the empire in twice the number of years, if he had not (by a sort of pre-occupying genius) managed his artillery conformably to the inventions of the succeeding century; and this justice Tilly allowed him at the reduction of Magdeburg, for he had but one excellent engineer in all his army, and that was Farenbach, who had learnt his profession under Gustavus, and then deserted.

Mean

1630. Mean while his majesty, undismayed by difficulties, and no ways deterred by disproportionable numbers, taking the advantages of Walstein's avocations, and Tilly's jealousies, crossed the small frith which divides Usedom from the continent; it being little more than the mouth of the river Pene; and leaving serjeant-major-general Kniphausen to guard Pennemond-fort and the rest of the island, marched directly to the town of Wolgast, and cutting to pieces two hundred Croats out of a larger number that opposed him, made himself master of a strong fort at the water's edge sword in hand, and left Banier to maintain it. Nevertheless, during this slight attempt on the town of Wolgast (for it merits not to be called a military operation in good earnest, the intent being only to feel the real strength of that important city) Torquato de Conti *, chief commander in those parts, an elder officer than Walstein (who was at that time undeprieved) but not so dexterous nor successful, and beneath him too in rank and authority, marching at the head of three German regiments †, made a fruitless attempt to raise the siege.

For upon all occasions this general shewed himself to be no great commander. By meer dint of extortion it is true he wrested from the duke of Pomerania the strong towns of Gartz and Griffenhagen, but miscarried in his attempt on Stetin, though he dispatched colonel Walstein thither, who carried a letter of summons from his kinsman and namesake ‡. Indeed it has been matter of difficulty to some, why Torquato did not attempt to oppose Gustavus at his first landing, or

* Bougeant calls him Torquato Conti; but to speak properly he should be called Torquato de Conti: Torquatus de Comitibus, according to the tenour of the Imperial patent. He was originally destined to the church, but chose rather to carry arms; and served first in Lombardy among the Spanish troops as captain of horse, and then under Bucquoy in the Hungarian wars. He was little beloved, and less confided in, by the soldiers: and on account of his exactions and severities, the common people always surnamed him The Devil. Nevertheless, before he passed into the Imperial service, he was the first man who discovered Mazarine's genius, and recommended him, when he was about twenty-three years old, to his holiness the pope. Upon his abdication of the Imperial service, he obtained a fresh employment at Rome, which suited better with his age and infirmities; for he was made captain-general of the ecclesiastical forces.

give him battle at least a few days after his arrival? Nevertheless, of this difficulty one may safely venture to give a solution. The whole country had been depopulated by the Imperialists; nor could their general with certainty transport provisions to his army from the parts of the empire which lay to the southward; whilst Gustavus for the first two months, having the ocean open at his pleasure, derived sure and moderate, though not abundant supplies from his own country. It was upon this account that Torquato fell back and formed two camps at Gartz and Stolp, almost at the two extremities of Outer-Pomerania, making Landsberg, which forms the southern point of the triangle, a fort of intermediate place of residence, by the emperor's express orders.

And here I shall digress for one moment, in order to observe, that it was one great error in this general (not the less absurd for being common) to destroy, in the manner he did, all cattle, provisions, barns, hay-stacks, and mills, merely with a view to deprive the Swedes of subsistence at their first arrival. If the house of Austria had previously paid for these things, and then destroyed them, the conduct had been admirable; but in the other view of the question, she lost the hearts of the common people irrecoverably: for we must take human nature from the highest to the lowest as it really is, and though a peasant may greatly esteem his prince and country, he is weak enough to love his family, and his little dearly-earned acquisitions still more. The event soon justified the observation, for Gustavus from that moment wanted nothing at the market price.

And here I may still give the reader a better idea of Torquato de Conti's inabilities; for about this time, (namely, at or near the landing of Gustavus) Sigismund king of Poland informed him by letter what sort of warrior he must expect to find in the person of his Swedish majesty; and how much it behoved him to keep a strict eye to the preservation of Pomerania. But Torquato, who, though a native of Italy, had more Spanish fastuosity in his temper than Roman cautiousness, returned him a short contemptuous answer, (conformably to the language then used at Vienna) which he never afterwards took

From Wolgast his majesty returned to Usedom, and gave some little attention to matters of politics, employing his troops at the same time in the total reduction of that island, and a small one contiguous to it called Wollin.

His first business was to give audience to the ministers of his cousins the dukes of Mecklenberg †, and the deputies from Stralsund; and some private intercourses passed between him and the duke of Pomerania ‡; for the latter terrified by the menaces, and dismayed by the severities of the house of Austria, had made some overtures to his Swedish majesty on the subject of returning home, and leaving the empire to be the sole arbiter of its own repose.

For this prince well foreseeing which way the storm of the north pointed, had sent to Gustavus just before he embarked, to beseech him to make some other country than Pomerania the seat of invasion: many memorials and replies passed between the Swedish and Pomeranian ministers; at length the king told the latter, just as he was going on ship-board, That he would carry his answer in person to the duke their master.

Rightly therefore concluding, that these difficulties proceeded more from fear than any real disinclination to his expedition, he advanced directly to the strong fort of Schwein, situated on the eastern side of the island, and mastered it without resistance; for the Imperial garrison thought fit to dislodge at first sight, and crossed the river into the island of Wollin: which little district (for it is somewhat smaller than Usedom, being about twenty miles long by ten or twelve broad) is formed into an island by the sea, the Frishoff-lake, the mouth of the Oder, and a small frith, that is half rivulet and half morass. Gustavus having found some boats, soon pursued the Imperialists across the water, who in their flight set fire to a fine castle belonging to the elector of Saxony's sister, and soon evacuated the island, leaving behind them their cannon, baggage, and a part of their horses. Here were found two beautiful leopards confined in a cage, being destined by Walsstein as a present to the emperor: for as he had the vanity to consider himself as admiral of the Baltic, he thought it necessary to give some proofs at Vienna of his commercial correspondence.

In these two islands the king repofed himself near a fortnight, not from any affection that he bore to a state of tranquillity, or inactivity, but merely to procure means to himself of transporting his artillery, troops, and baggage over the lake of Frishoff, a passage of about twelve miles in length, which gave him entrance into the large mouth of the Oder, and thence to Stetin: of which enterprize we shall speak more distinctly hereafter.

During the interval of preparation and reflexion necessary to an enterprize of this nature, we will cast our eyes for a few minutes on the diet of Ratisbon, which subsisted at this very time, and had been convened before Gustavus arrived in Germany; or, to speak more properly, previously to his landing. But after his embarkation the states of the empire, at the earnest solicitation of the protestants, had assembled themselves at Ratisbon, in order to deliberate about the means of restoring their country to its ancient tranquillity. But upon the grand event of his Swedish majesty's arrival in the isle of Usedom, Cesar, as the Germans affect to call him, gave indications of his supreme will to the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, commanding them to supply his numerous army with provisions and military stores; and upon these conditions generously promising them to make some mitigations in their favour (by way of acknowledgment) in the edict of restitution. Gustavus likewise notified his appearance in Germany to the latter of these two electors, and expounded to him the reasons that induced him to make an attempt upon Pomerania (that country being contiguous to the electorate of Brandenburg) preferably to any other part of the empire, making him at the same time an offer of security and protection, provided he did not oppose him in an hostile manner.

1630. It is much to be doubted whether it was in the emperor's power, consistently with common prudence and external appearances, to have put by this general convention of the Germanic body. The protestant princes had been almost ruined, and complained so loudly, that it was necessary to make them some ostensible concessions: for military executions on the one hand, and the forensic executions on the other hand, had forced the edict into full activity, and many princes, the duke of Wirtemberg in particular, had allowed the monks, nuns, and clergy to repossess their ancient establishments. The elector of Saxony likewise was particularly anxious to maintain his son Augustus in the archbishopric of Magdeburg, which the emperor had assigned in imagination to his second son Leopold. Upon this account the elector promoted privately the assembly at Heidelberg in 1629, from whence a petition for the revocation of the edict was addressed to his Imperial majesty, and a slight sort of confederation projected between the protestant powers; nor were certain oblique and indistinct innuendos omitted with reference to Gustavus. But what was still worse, many princes of the catholic persuasion wished for peace, inasmuch as their countries had been terribly harassed even by the armies of their victorious friends. Of this class was the duke of Neuburg, descended from a younger branch of the Palatine family. The archbishop of Saltzburg too had withdrawn his contributions for no better reason, but because no desirable spot of protestant ground bordered upon the edges of his territories, at a time when his neighbours were all making new acquisitions. The elector of Triers * likewise grew sick of the depredations of the Spanish troops, and the elector of Cologne, brother to the duke of Bavaria, joined with him in remonstrances on the same subject; yet not one of these princes would consent to annihilate the edict of restitution.

Nevertheless, certain suspicions, or glimmerings of suspicion, were supposed to prevail amongst these princes; for though the real object of the house of Austria was the demolition and destruction of the protestant party, that being considered as a work of no extraordinary dif-

faculty; yet a traverse scene was to be drawn behind this outside one, and the deep design at bottom was to humiliate the catholics in their turn, and establish an universal monarchy in the empire. Count d'Ognata, the Spanish ambassador, unfortunately opened himself once upon this subject, and said, "That the episcopal gowns in Germany were something of the longest, and wanted paring."

Upon the occasion of this diet the emperor made a magnificent entry, attended by his wife and son, the king of Hungary and Bohemia. All the catholic electors appeared. The electors of Brandenburg and Saxony, though personally written to by the emperor, implored him to listen to the representations of Sweden and France, and conclude an universal peace. Of which the real reason was (though the elector of Brandenburg complained that fourteen regiments complete had been quartered on him alone, and the Austrian regiments were then extremely large) that both these electors declined to see the emperor in person, as they did not chuse to elect his son king of the Romans: nor was the duke of Saxony by any means so poor as he pretended; and what was still more, they had maintained an indistinct but timorous correspondence with Gustavus, and had a consciousness that something of that nature might take air during the transactions of the diet.

Each of these princes pleaded poverty in order to be excused attendance, and mentioned the seemingly incredible sums which the Imperial officers had extorted from their subjects*. Such public ex-pilations had never been known or read of; and besides all this, a lively picture was drawn, not only of the avarice, but of the cruelty and insolence of the commanders †; and by way of conclusion it was strongly recommended upon supposition a laudable peace could not be procured, that new laws should be made with regard to conquests, contributions, and plunder; and that a fresh system of discipline and regularity should be enforced by the strongest penal sanctions that could be devised. It was requested also that some more effectual method of paying the army might be proposed to the public; and 1630. that a better application might be made of the Germanic money collected and set apart for this purpose: in which latter clause the catholic electors all agreed; for the Imperial armies made little difference between friends and foes.

Great part of the military licentiousness and forensic irregularities above complained of was attributed to Walstein, whom the world in general agreed to style the German Dictator. The confederate princes and electors hated him as a new raised man, who from a Bohemian gentleman, by the emperor's indulgence and facility, rose to be first a count, and then duke of Fridland, Sagan, and Mechlenberg. His manner of living disgusted them too, for he maintained finer retinues, and kept a more magnificent table, than most of them could afford to imitate. But in generosity, and a more than princely affectation of rewarding valour and merit, he exceeded them all; for it was a maxim with him, that a prince who desired to be served cheap, had always cheap services done him. There were other circumstances peculiar to this unaccountable person, which produced fresh uneasinesses; for being uncommunicative by nature, and reserved by choice, he familiarized himself with none of his associates, neither imparting his own designs, or collecting the sentiments of others, except at such distance as was unobservable: so that upon the whole, at least to external appearances, he overlooked all men's opinions, and neglected all men's advice, if we except only his Imperial majesty. For these reasons he levied contributions, granted protections, disposed of troops in garrisons and into winter quarters, without ever consulting the princes in whose territories these destinations were made; and upon any complaint or remonstrance from them, his answer was, That he had offended formerly by an improper condescension; but perceiving mankind to be devoid of gratitude on that head, he for the future should change his mildness into asperity.

It may next be observed, that besides the electors and their deputies, many persons of great consequence paid their attendance at this diet, as Sir Robert Anstruther from England, M. Brulart and Father Joseph on the part of France, and Ruldorf in the behalf of the elector Palatin.

latin. Indeed the diet in general was the most pompous and magnificent that had ever been known, (a circumstance that ill became the deplorable misery and poverty of those times); and it is thought the expences of the duke of Bavaria alone, though that may not sound high to the ears of an Englishman, amounted to near 25,000 pounds a month*.

Tilly likewise, and Anholt †, the two generals of the catholic league, made each of them an extremely handsome appearance. The former spoke of Gustavus in the highest terms of respect, and, inauspiciously for himself, compared the grand event of a war to a single fortunate cast upon the dice: but Walstein, who then did not think his revocation so certain, rivalled even his master in point of show, being attended by 600 horsemen finely mounted and richly habited, which inspired no small envy into the electors, and paved the way to his future disgrace.

It may justly be imagined, that all parties here assembled had their respective games to manage. The house of Austria aimed at universal monarchy over papists as well as protestants; and wanted likewise to give a check to the interposition of all foreign powers in the affairs of the empire: and a third grand object still remained behind the scene, which was to cause Ferdinand, the emperor's son, to be then appointed king of the Romans. The elector of Bavaria had his reasons for traversing indirectly this last attempt, and desired likewise to substitute Tilly in the room of Walstein. The protestant electors co-operated with him in this respect. Their deputies harangued largely on the insolence and expletions of Walstein duke of Fridland (for few people cared to give him the title he derived from Mechlenberg) and remarked in the course of their invectives, that he had waged war upon countries against which no war had been ever declared. In this combination against the general, the Spanish ministers and the Hispaniolized

1630. Auftrians moft heartily concurred. France interfered too upon its old principle of firft disturbing the waters, and then purloining a good part of the prey. The elector Palatin acted purely out of form, without any hopes of fuccefs; and the British ambaffador appeared in the character of a preacher more than a negotiator. As to the ecclefiastical electors, they aimed at nothing but at Walstein's difmiffion, and the full continuance of the edict of reftitution.

The emperor promoted and carried on the intrigues of this afsembly very artfully; for though he determined to grant the proteftants no one advantage, yet at the fame time he well forefaw, that the appearance of making fome confeffions bore the air of plaufibility and mildnefs. Moreover, he had refolved within himfelf to infinuate, that as France, Holland, and Sweden, all caballed againft the empire, and fent both men and money into it, it behoved the proteftants, as well as catholics, to unite in one common fyftem, and frustrate fuch public attacks on the Germanic body in general. It was argued fpecifically, that the elector Palatin had given no figns of compunition, and therefore it was neceffary to pafs an irreversible fentence upon him: that the Dutch had long fhaken off all filial duty to the Cefaréan throne, and had rendered themfelves mafters of feveral towns which appertained to the empire, not without intentions of replacing the elector Palatin in the Lower-Palatinate: that the French king had interfered both in Italy and Germany, without follicitation on one part, and without giving previous notice on the other part: and, laftly, that Guftavus was worthy of blame above meafure, fince he had never received the leaft provocation from the houfe of Auftria; there fubfifting in truth no one difpute between him and the emperor but the affair of Stralfund, in the accommodation of which matter he had neglected to liften to Dhona, the Imperial ambaffador, as alfo to a public minifter on the part of Denmark, who had undertaken the office of a mediator. One cannot prefume abfolutely to contradict this laft af fertion; yet it is plain enough to the clear-fighted and intelligent, that the king of Denmark's friendfhip to Guftavus carried with it an in-fincere afpect, which naturally created miftruft and fufpicions. That prince justly triumphed, it is true, in prefiguring to himself, that the house of Austria might happen to be humbled to a certain degree; yet it did not please him to behold the Swedes in possession of Stralsund; nor did he like the establishment Gustavus had made for himself in the island of Rugen, which gave him an unlimited command on either side of the Baltic ocean. He had a secret joy however in predicting to his nation, that Sweden and Austria would at length weary and torment themselves into a state of inactivity. These ideas joined to a good degree of caution, intermingled with timidity, kept him in a sort of suspense, which he thought fit to surname a neutrality: yet at bottom he dreaded Gustavus, and hated him too, and in spite of all obligations which the protestant religion might be supposed to have on his mind, preferred the interests of the house of Austria in his more reserved and secret wishes.

On the other hand, it appeared plainly, that the Imperial ministers made peace only a plausible pretext in the first article of the several proposals produced by them; for the five subsequent ones breathed nothing but menaces, chastisements, and hostilities; of which we have a clear proof: for when all the protestant deputies implored the emperor to put a stop to such unmerciful proceedings, cardinal Klefel*, who had relinquished politics, except with a view to humble Walstein, replied coldly and unconcernedly: It was the decree of heaven, that people should bear patiently what they had deserved †. To recapitulate

* Melchior, archbishop of Vienna, prime minister and favourite of the emperors Rodolphus and Mathias.

† We cannot but suspect that historians have made this speech proceed from a wrong mouth: since this first personage in the Austrian cabinet was generously enclined to the Bohemian protestants, and no great friend to the Spanish faction. For when in the year 1618, he persuaded Mathias to use mild and lenient methods towards the revolvers in Bohemia and the annexed provinces, and displayed in the strongest lights the miserable effects of persecution and intestine wars, Ognata the Spanish ambassador made no ceremony to consider him as a traitor; and the archduke Ferdinand (next year elected emperor) roundly told him, He would rather see the kingdom ruined, than damned. Hist. Eccl. Bohem. 12^o. p. 152.

From these hints the cardinal archbishop soon concluded his downfall to be inevitable, and as he went to court conjured his domestics to stand upon their guard. The apostolic nuncio attended him. When he entered the antichamber, a chamberlain of the archduke's made his master's excuses for not receiving him. The emperor likewise compelled him to wait some time (the council-door being bolted, and he and Ognata

1630. all the several offences of the protestant princes will be difficult; but the duke of Pomerania's irremissible crime was, that he had wished the emperor ill-success in a bumper of white ale.

As to the ambassadors from foreign countries, it may safely be said, that Anstruther at least did nothing, having in truth nothing meritorious in his power to perform: for though he had certain authorities to treat with the Imperial commissaries and the electoral princes, yet it is evident, that no good could be produced from such attempts, as the house of Austria aimed only at cajoling his master, and procrastinating those dormant good wishes which he bore to the Palatinate and the protestant cause. Nevertheless, by the artful interposition of Spain, who pretended to stand in the character of a third person between their Britannic and Imperial majesties, he was received politely and courteously by the emperor, who perhaps at that time had some fears of an alliance then transacting between Charles and Gustavus.

Anstruther's second instructions, bearing date July 22, 1630, carried the same conciliating pacific air, which those of James I. had formerly borne, and are filled with remonstrances and deprecations instead of menaces and resentment. They have all one tone; Armis semotis, nostro exemplo: and his Britannic majesty declares in them, that the elector in close conference) and then baron de Preüner came out and told him, (whilst Dampier and Colalto waited below with an armed force) that he had committed great mismanagements in the government, and must retire with him: to which step the then pope Paul V. had given his consent. The cardinal put himself into great emotion at so abrupt an attack, and talked very loudly in his own justification; upon which Preüner presented him with a riding coat and black hat, compelling him, much against his will, to quit his red hat and pallium: and having conducted him privately down a back stair-case. Dampier received him in a close post-chariot, and conveyed him to Inspruck, the court obliging him to sign a resignation of all his preferments. And thus room was made for cardinal Dirichstein.

In vain Mathias lamented his disgrace, for he loved him entirely, and confided in him above all men; nor was he made privy to the stratagem. All the answer he could receive from Ferdinand and his adherents, was, that the measures taken had a view purely to his glory. He then requested a promise from them in writing, that they would not injure the cardinal's life or fortune; but they only gave him their engagements of honour. When Urban VIII. examined this great minister's cause, he was found to have neither money nor possessions. A disculpation was then passed in his favour: nevertheless, he declined all concern with state affairs, except with regard to the dismissal of Wallstein; and died in 1630, aged seventy-seven.

Palatin

Palatin had configned to him implicitly the management of all his affairs (an assertion which may perhaps be liable to some queries and explanations) and that notwithstanding his father and himself had ever proved unsuccessful in their interpositions on Frederic's behalf, yet that he should still continue to pursue the same pious work and salutary measures: and the rather, as his catholic majesty exhorted him to persevere in this plan, giving him reasons to expect the most equitable condescensions from the emperor: and for fear these advances might not prove considerable enough, Anstruther had powers likewise to become responsible for the Palatin's submissions *. Nevertheless it no where appears, that these powers were derived from their proper source of authority, that is to say, from the elector Palatin himself.

Some few weeks after the date of this second commission, I believe towards the conclusion of the month of August, (for we will not violate the chronological series of history without acknowledgment, though upon the whole it appeareth best to me to consider the affairs of the Palatinate under one general article as much as possible;) the said ambassador from England was admitted to an Imperial audience at Vienna, (not being able to procure such admission at the late diet) where he made a long submissive and plaintive speech †, which carried with it more the air of an elegy, than the spirited representation of a powerful kingdom. Its purport was, (for I care not how little time we employ in analyzing it) " That the king his master acknowledged with grief and shame, that
 " nion and concurrence, had acted formerly (in reference to the crown " of Bohemia) not only rashly, but unadvisedly; which imprudent
 " measures ought chiefly to be attributed to the ambition and inattention
 " of youth; and that it would highly become the emperor, consistently " with his accustomed clemency, to receive his submissions, and re-*inst*ate
 " him into his dominions, inasmuch as such an act of free and gratui-
 " tous favour would oblige the kings of England to all posterity.

1630. It then proceeded to remark, “ That his majesty of England (notwithstanding a pretence for war appeared self-evident) always chose to prefer the amicable adjustments of treaty, so often essayed, and negligently regarded by all his friends ! reposing himself in every emergency upon the known candor and mansuetude of the house of Austria.—In the next place the folly of this speech is equal to its abjectness ; since war is there considered as the most unchristian act in human nature, and the most uncertain. Mention is then made of the kind interpositions from the courts of Madrid and Bruxelles : (than which nothing could be more impudently or infamously insincere ;) and the merites non petits of James I. towards the house of Austria are strongly inculcated.—No pretensions of right are so much as glanced at : on the contrary, all is referred” (as if one was addressing the supreme being) “ to the free gratuitous unconditional mercy and clemency of the Imperial throne. Lastly the distressed, the poverty, the exile of the numerous Palatin family are depicted with all the pathos of an affecting tragedy *, and then a petition is preferred for an allowance just sufficient to keep them from starving, which, faith Anstruther, by prescription of right as well as the laws of piety cannot be denied to any person consistently with common justice.”

Thus, as an Austrian historian observeth †, he flattered and trembled like a criminal pleading his cause before Pluto. Walfstein’s associates joined with Anstruther upon these representations, partly to prevent England from combining with Sweden, and partly to play the elector Palatin’s re-establishment against the immeasurable ambition of the duke of Bavaria. But all these attempts were eluded with politely giving them a patient hearing ; and the unhappy Anstruther fate himself down contented ; for the Austrians knew the extent of Charles’s hereditary patience to an hair’s breadth, and had received likewise indirect but tolerably certain assurances, that he had been tampering for some time with Gustavus, whom he had invested with the order of the garter, 1630. several years before at the siege of Dirfchau.

It may be worth observing here, that Frederic was more political and heroical than his brother Charles; and Rusdorf *, his first agent at the diet, gave proofs of ability and firmness far superior to what Anstruther could pretend to imitate. His master, the elector Palatin, had taken the precaution to convey letters to each elector, all written with his own hand, in which he besought them to interpose their good offices with the emperor in his behalf. To these representations his Imperial majesty replied artfully enough, That he had private dispositions in that unhappy prince's favour, whereof he should soon behold the benign effects, if he would personally ask his pardon, renounce the crown of Bohemia and his own electorate for himself and his heirs; and enter into no future alliances or intrigues either with German princes or foreigners; and then only, and upon these conditions, promised from the mere inherent motives of bounty and clemency residing in his breast, to restore to him the part of a province, and a pension suitable to the dignity of a prince.

These proposals served to amuse the king of England very well; but Frederic rejected them like a man of honour and spirit, laughed at them, despised them, and detested them: for though this prince was no great hero in the field, he had a just sense of his parentage and station; and declared peremptorily, that he would have all the Palatinate or none:

* One of the ablest prime ministers of the elector Palatin, who resided many years in a public capacity at London, where he collected all the negotiations and state-transactions relative to Great Britain and the continent: which MS. work, consisting of several volumes in folio, is still preserved in the archives at Hesse-Cassel: and from a syllabus of the contents transmitted to me deserveth highly to be rendered public; since it is certain the affairs of the Palatinate influenced all our measures more or less during the reigns of James I. and Charles his son. As to the style of Rusdorf (for the collection I am speaking of is composed in Latin) the reader may easily form an idea from the other performances he has thought fit to publish, the Vindiciæ Palatinæ being one of the completest works the world ever saw, and in the single articles of method, brevity, and perspicuity may dispute the palm even with Thomas Aquinas's Summæ, so justly celebrated for these perfections. It is here we may admire him in the character of a politician, jus-publicist, and civilian; and as to his classical abilities, witness his beautiful elegy, entitled, QUERELA FREDERICI MISSA UNIONI, written with all the elegance and spirit of the antients. And if one may form any conjectures from similitude of thought and language, it was he that composed the epistle from the city of Heidelberg in the character of an unassailable virgin, to general Tilly in 1621. when the English garrison behaved so gloriously. It begins, Siccine virgineum, &c.

1630. nor should any worldly motive induce him to cut off his children's birth-right and leave them pensioners to the house of Austria, if they were of a tame disposition; or vagabonds and mercenary soldiers, if they were of an heroic one.

In return to this, it is remarked by some, that the emperor alledged by way of compurgating himself, that the better part of Frederic's dominions were deposited in the hands of the infanta Clara Isabella *. But the elector Palatin gave no ear to such ridiculous cajolements and excuses.

But to return to Anstruther's oration: it is amazing, that our historians know nothing of this speech, nor the four extraordinary conditions required by the emperor, though the reigns of James and Charles I. can never be understood with any common degree of clearness, except we comprehend far better than we do at present the whole transaction relative to the Palatinate with respect to ourselves as well as the courts of Vienna, Madrid, and Bruxelles. The reader therefore may have some slight obligation to me for producing this political threnody after the expiration of a century, and one fifth of another; yet still it will be hard to ascertain what these four indigestible propositions truly consisted of. I once mentioned the affair transiently to a German nobleman, who at present is the brightest luminary of the court he serves, and than whom no one is more intimately conversant in the depths of history; and upon the whole it appeared highly probable to me, that the proposals from the Austrian ministry were to this effect: (1) That Frederic should resign the upper Palatinate forever to the family of Bavaria: (2) And accept a pension for his own life. (3) That his elder son should be bred a catholic at Vienna, and having espoused an arch-duchess of Austria, be re-instated at the father's death into the lower Palatinate. (4) And, lastly, that the

There are many fine pictures of her: his grace of Devonshire hath a good one. It is suspected by many that she was rendered barren before she was created arch-duchess; for when Philip II. consigned the seventeen provinces to her by way of dowry (which seeming act of dismemberment gave his son no small disquiet,) he answered like a politician formed in his own Coimbrian college, Promississe se quidem eas provincias, sed multas rationes & causas posse inveniri, quæ eum hoc promisso absolvant. *Arcana Dominat. elector Palatine in asking pardon should submit to the odious circumstance of genuflection. 1630.

As this prince, whose affairs explain the secret history of Great-Britain for fourteen years, appears to be known chiefly by hearsay to the English historians, I shall venture to observe concerning him, that the unhappy Frederic seems to have been born to nothing but turmoils, troubles and disappointments *. The dukes of Neuburg and Deux Ponts disputed strongly, during his minority, the administration of the Palatinate ; the one by virtue of the late elector's will, and the other as being the nearest relation to him. At length the emperor Rodolphus decided in favour of the duke de Deux Ponts, who exercised the office of guardian, as guardians usually do, that is, severely and insolently enough. Our young prince was son of Frederic IV. and the celebrated Louisa Juliana, whom Spanheim's pen hath rendered immortal in one of the most curious pieces of history we have extant †. Formed at Sedan under the duke de Bouillon, and most virtuously educated, he understood Latin extremely well, and talked all the modern languages ; he was likewise uncommonly versed in history, and consulted with peculiar ardour the peace of the empire. For he had three excellent ministers, Camerarius, Grun, and Rusdorf.

The moment he was disengaged by age from the incumbrance of a guardian, he hastened into England, and espoused Elizabeth daughter of James I. The English, who are seldom indifferent upon any occasion, took it into their heads to be extremely transported with this protestant match ; and to do them justice, indeed they had reason. Universal joy seized the whole nation : the balls, carousals, and feastings were innumerable. The very poets were called in from every quarter : such magnificence of the scene hath rarely been beheld in the most expensive and extravagant times. Jonson and Davenant held the pen ; Lawes composed the music ; Inigo Jones contrived the theatrical architecture, and the best painters on this side the Alps garnished the scenes with their pencils ‡.

‡ So that by a calculation which hath fallen

These

1630. These honours, to which the order of the garter was added, lulled Frederic into a sort of dream, and rendered him a visionary in ambition, to which the spirited and magnanimous temper of his wife did not a little contribute *. He forgot his own dominions, (in themselves the most beautiful, and at that time the most flourishing in the empire) and caught incautiously, though honestly, and with some diffidence, at what he imagined to be a most plausible acquisition, the crown of Bohemia.

Had this prince been blest with a caution and penetration that rarely fall to a young man's share, had he well known his own comparative weakness, or the strength and fury of his enemies, had he seen ever so little into the mutability, insincerity and timidity of his father-in-law, who never held but one tone, namely, abstineto ab armis fatuis, he might then by a mere act of intuition have rejected the offers made him by the protestants in Bohemia, who fought him not as a sure protector and safeguard, but as the only one that could then be found.

Amongst other things, this unhappy young man, conformably to the custom of that age, allowed himself to be influenced by judicial astrology; and as the book of fate was a volume which every star-gazer could read his own way, backward, forward, sideways or downward, it happened that one of these genius's gave the decisive fixture to Frederic's irresolution: who was hardly warm in the regal throne, when the battle of Prague put an end not only to his power, but even to his expectations. Thus vacating a throne which he never enjoyed, he retired into Holland for an asylum, and lived twelve years an exile upon public charity. His friend and relation the king of Denmark was too unfortunate in war, to be able to render him any assistance: and his father-in-law paid him only with school distinctions and adages, instead of well conducted troops and letters of exchange.

As a warrior it must be acknowledged he made no great figure, for he committed a notable error in creating Anspach generalissimo, and secretly favoured Hohenlo, whom all men suspected, and who afterwards deserted him. He wanted neither courage nor firmness; but they were more of the reflective than military cast: for just before the battle of Prague, he conveyed his eldest son and declared successor out of the kingdom of Bohemia, which cast a damp upon all men's spirits; he left the field of action like a discomfited colonel of Croats, and not with the dignity of a retreating prince, losing his order of the garter in the precipitation of retiring, and upon this account the Imperial beaux-esprits affixed a programme on the gates of Prague to the following effect: namely, "That great rewards should be bestowed on the person " who could give any tidings or intelligence of a certain run-away

 " monarch, in the flower of his youth, of a complexion inclining to
 " the florid, diminutive in stature, with a beard entirely juvenile, and " eyes squinting a little: of himself a well-conditioned and worthy
 " young man, but seduced by evil-minded and seditious advisers*." This is the first hue and cry after a fugitive king that I remember to have met with either in ancient or modern history.

Yet this prince, in all other respects relating to civil and political life, appears to be steadfast and unshaken: for he remonstrated in the election of the king of the Romans, that if the Austrian succession was not interrupted then, when the right line failed, there remained no hope hereafter, when that honour was conferred on Ferdinand, who, having issue, would make it an appendix for ever to the Imperial throne; and instead of sinking under the oppressions of the house of Austria, he rather seems to rise upon them, preserving a clearness of judgment as well as an uniformity of temper under the severest trials †. Yet part of this may be attributed to the conduct of Elizabeth of England his consort, who was intrepid and heroic beyond all the rest of her family; for when young Thurn undertook to defend Prague a single day, in order to facilitate her escape, she generously refused to force the brave son of her best friend to fall into the hands of an unforgiving enemy. And though it is certain that her Bohemian majesty never gave countenance to any intrigue, yet she had a violent inclination to be adored at a distance. She was not to be called a consummate beauty, though then in the height of her bloom,

630. being aged about twenty-three years; but her figure was both of the majestic and attractive kind *, and she certainly possessed what the French call the manners and the graces. Her very courage and presence of mind provided her admirers; half the army being her passionate innamorato's. The brave Christian duke of Brunswic was her tractable slave †; and so were young Thurn and lord Craven. They all fought for her, as much as the cause, and the latter when he left the wars (all hopes, of recovering the Palatinate being cut off by the death of Gustavus) carried his enthusiasm so far, that he built the fine house of Hampsted Marshall, on the banks of the river Kennet in Berkshire (a tract of country not unlike the Palatinate, nor superior to many parts thereof in beauty) as a sort of asylum for his injured princefs ‡.

It is certain that posterity, which usually draws conclusions from the successful or unfortunate nature of events, may blame Frederic for accepting the throne of Bohemia prematurely. Yet that prince had excellent ministers, who judged rightly according to the probability of second causes: but his pacific father-in-law deceived every expectation of the young prince: and the Bohemians, as much as they languished for liberty, declined to advance all pecuniary assistances. Nevertheless, it must not be dissembled, that a pamphlet was published at that period, namely, in the year 1620, some few months before the battle of Prague, which for spirit, elegance, and political acumen surpasseth any thing relative to the times in question, which I have perused ||, and contained true suggestions no way disadvantageous to the prosperity of Frederic.

“ If you have any friends, they are your father-in-law, your wife, and the maréchal de Bouillon. As to your concealed or nominal friends the Bohemians are the first; they declared you king by mere necessity, having made a previous tender of the crown to the electors of Saxony and Bavaria, and even to the prince of Transylvania. It was their original intention to have created you a stadtholder of Holland or an advoyer of Berne; but the unforeseen election of an emperor forced them to change the consul into the king. You have taken oaths like an inconsiderable dependant; the states are your accusers, your witnesses, and your judges. They can wage war when they please, but you cannot: they can levy an army against you, whilst at the same time you are not master of an arsenal, a magazine, or a single regiment. In a word, Sire, you are a tree that is propped, but not rooted. One may add also, that the Lutheran party dislike you in private, and the Hussites likewise.

“ Venture not to imitate the example of your uncle Maurice. No prince ever waged war with more difficulties and greater success; no son ever afforded more sincere pleasure or reputation to the ghost of a father; those whom he conquered adored him, and made him a promise of eternal affection. Yet at this moment, if he had not prevented the malice of certain ill-wishers, nothing had remained of him but a name in history, and Barnevelt had reigned: for the war between liberty and monarchy is inextinguishable. It is just thus in Bohemia. You desire to be a king in substance, and not in shadow. You want subjects, and they request a servant.

“ Nor have you better reasons to rely upon the friendship or fidelity of Gabriel Bethlem. He is piqued at miscarrying in the Bohemian election: contented now to fix his foot in Hungary by your means, to put in for a half share of the general wreck of the incorporated provinces, or upon any good occasion join with the emperor, and make the same division with him, as he now wishes to effect with you.

 “ mians *, and there you may see he makes no ceremony of betraying
 “ you to the Turks upon a proper occasion. As to the Venetians, your “ Bohemian subjects will acquire no good sentiments in your behalf, by “ entering into an alliance with determined republicans. The free-

 “ are composed. Worms, Spire, Francfort, Ulm, and Nuremberg “ thought you too powerful before. Remember to practise what Cicero “ advised the novos homines : farewell.”

The age we are speaking of, hardly ever afforded a more spirited, or more sensible remonstrance than the present ; and it is a pleasure to me to snatch from oblivion a fragment of history of so uncommon a cast. It is all truth more or less ; and it is likewise a very compendious sort of truth, powerfully and forcibly pointed ; and happy had it been for the unfortunate elector Palatin, if he had paid regard to a system of politics which perhaps came from a determined enemy : but the influence of his evil stars gained the ascendancy, to which ambition at length contributed some small quantity of assistance, at places and moments that were deemed convenient.

Had Gustavus lived, the elector might in all probability been re-established at last : but on the death of that prince he soon followed his generous deliverer, labouring under no other malady than a broken heart ; and died at Mentz in the thirty-seventh year of his age, leaving behind him a consort of unparalleled resolution and ten children under age.

It is true, the Bohemians alledge in their defence, that this prince was too œconomical to preserve a kingdom that had been generously offered him : but this is only taking the advantage of being the first accusers, and transferring the fault to him, which was more peculiarly their own. For as to generosity he performed vast works with respect to the palace of Heidelberg, which any one will soon acknowledge when he knows the

1630. rock upon which it stands ; and perfected with immense expence the fortifications of Manheim, begun by his father Frederic IV. And in regard to his mildness of government, it is certain, that the common people loved him extremely : and amongst other reasons, that which a poor peasant gave, was not a contemptible one ; “ Friend,” said a Spanish general to an inhabitant of the Palatinate, “ what makes you “ adhere so pertinaciously to an exiled and nominal sovereign ?” “ Why, “ Sir,” replied the fellow, “ that prince, when he presided over us, “ raised fewer taxes in a year, than you extort from us in the space of “ a month * .”

Yet be these matters as they may, it was the fate of this unfortunate prince to be substantially unhappy, and amused at intervals with momentary glimmerings of hope to the very last. Before the battle of Prague, he appeared to have all things at his devotion. Two years afterwards the great Mansfelt, who was a warrior cast in a particular mold, retrieved his affairs a second time : whilst the journey he made through France incognito, and the quarters of arch-duke Leopold's soldiers, highly merits to be well represented : but the loss of three decisive battles, and three several armies, in the space of two months and eight days, reduced him at length to sign the following extraordinary dismissal of his troops, which discovers more greatness of mind than despondency. Nor can I abstain from attempting to recover a fragment of history so extremely curious.

This document he subscribed with his own hand, and affixed his seal to it July 13, 1622.

But to return from this digression, which we hope carries novelty enough with it to procure its pardon, we will resume the negotiations at the diet of Ratisbon, where Brulart † the French minister discharged his duty with parts and industry : for (not to mention his private transactions and intrigues) he set himself in public only to prove this one proposition, That France had not only an inherent affection for the empire, but power likewise to render it important services ; and that her interference formerly, now, and upon all future occasions, had, did, and ever would proceed from the glorious and disinterested principle of doing good to her neighbours. An ostensible doctrine she hath followed faithfully and invariably ever since !

Father Joseph, cardinal Richelieu's better half in matters of politics, made his appearance at this diet, intrusted with a separate commission, whereby he was commanded to exhibit a long deduction of the reasons that had induced France to afford protection and assistance to the duke of Mantua. He was charged likewise with one private instruction, and that was to traverse the designs of Walsstein's faction, whom the cardinal considered as a person too haughty and too intractable. To of his father's operations at the diet there, the cardinal dispatched him back with this studied and malignant introduction to his verbal orders : I beg you, Sir, on my part to inform your father— I mean, Sir, pray tell the ambassador—Brulart bequeathed by will five gold crowns to every person of his name who appeared at the anniversary celebration of his birth-day. 1630. make the bait more alluring, he promised the emperor, on the part of his master, to facilitate the election of his son as king of the Romans.

In virtue of these three commissions (for his business was only to interfere gently, and penetrate dextrously into other men's designs) he contributed in part, as some people thought, to the removal of Walstein; though in truth all parties wished it, and the event might have happened without his co-operation. He concluded a treaty with the emperor in relation to Italy, which all parties concerned thought fit to disapprove, and the French king declared he would never ratify, except some articles were expunged relative to his allies and friends, amongst whom Gustavus was supposed to be principally intended. And as to the election of a king of the Romans, he executed precisely just that very thing he proposed to himself; making abundance of promises, and keeping his actions in reserve. Thus much is certain, he performed his business so perplexedly on the one hand, and so distinctly on the other hand, that Richelieu ever afterwards made him the partaker of his secrets, and the counsellor of his bosom †: and how greatly Louis XIII. relished his negotiations

† This extraordinary man, conformably to a Latin manuscript life I have of him, written by father Leon, a Carmelite, was descended from the noble and illustrious family of the Le Clercs, and born in the year 1577. He had the complete education of a gentleman and a scholar, and passed his youth interchangeably between the Belles Lettres and Sciences, and the manly exercise and practice of arms. His Latin and Greek verses were much admired in France, and he perfected himself at Padua in jurisprudence and mathematics. At Rome he studied mankind and politics, and was much esteemed by Clement VIII. His mother, without committing any injury upon the patrimonial fortunes of the family, supplied him with money to make the tour of Germany and England; the constitutions of both which countries he knew to the bottom, and kept company with none but the great and best-instructed. In this latter voyage he considered England well in a religious sense, and paved the foundation for that introduction of popish emissaries, which gave afterwards such an untoward turn to the affairs of Charles I.

Conscious of his usefulness to the king and minister, he thought it redounded much more to his honour to perform the great things he did in the character of a private man, than to attract the formal observance of the people by the radiancy of a mitre and a cardinal's bonnet, both which he refused with firmness; affecting, from a peculiar greatness of mind, to be considerable in his own particular way; and best pleased to receive visits from Richelieu in a private lodging.

He made himself a Capuchin in the twenty-third year of his age, though not only his relations, but Louis XIII. himself attempted to dissuade him; and so much the rather, as he had passed through a campaign, in quality of a volunteer, with no small applause. He procured great benefactions and endowments to the religious orders, and took upon himself the difficult article of sending missionaries to the eastern nations.

negotiations at this diet, appears by the following passage in his epitaph 1630. (of which I have a transcript by me) Valtellinæ motus composuit, Ratisbonæ QUÆ rex optabat in soleuni conventu à Germanis EXPRESSIT; & multo ante Julio-dunensem pacem & Andegavensem procurabat —

It was during the session of this diet that news came of Gustavus's actual arrival in Germany: nor knew the assembly which to contemplate most, the redoubtable puissance of the emperor, or the heroic ambition of Gustavus, whose peculiar turn it was to consider few things to be so far elevated, as to be removed beyond his reach. It was remarked likewise by all parties, that he knew how to fight, and how to be obeyed; and as to discipline, he maintained it in equal subordination and proportion from the general to the meanest horse-boy in the service. It was a maxim with him to allow no one person of his army to remain inactive*: for when the operations of the field stood still, he constantly turned his men into pioneers and military architects; and when nothing of that nature presented itself, every common soldier was his own mechanic, his own taylor, and his own sempstress. It may seem ridiculous, but is incontestably true, that a Swedish officer might often be seen at hours of amusement, knitting his own stockings, and weaving his own point-lace. And with regard to the difficulties, that attended an invasion, Gustavus contrived to render them very easy; for his proveditors and soldiers paid for every thing at the full market-price; and when they found themselves straitened either for necessaries or conveniencies, acquiesced patiently, and took nothing by force. Thus the invader grew more actions. The duke d'Alençon, who was of the blood royal, and the wife of the constable Montmorenci, were his sponsors at the baptismal font; and it is remarked, that in his youth he produced fruits and blossoms at the same time. He talked most of the modern languages with great correctness, and was remarkably acute in his theological disputations. He had the humility to perform many journeys on foot, but entertained such high ideas of the glory of his country, that he entered into politics upon that single consideration. He directed the constable De Luynes before he undertook the management of Richelieu; and died in 1639, being constantly visited in his sickness by the cardinal's Richelieu and Bichi, the king's brother, the chancellor Seguier, the president Bouthilier, and the three secretaries of state. In a word, his individuating character was, that he seized the point in view at the first glance, even in cases of the most trying and perilous nature, and never departed with any notable variation from his original ideas.

1630. ceptable to the country than the person invaded ; nor do I find the peasants ever did the least mischief to the sick, the straggling, or wounded soldiers.

As Gustavus by this time appeared to have entered the empire in sincere good-earnest, it was now thought necessary by the Imperial party to venture upon some preliminary measures, in order to check his progress ; and as the command of rivers greatly influenced the success of war in those days, the Austrian ministry dispatched a requisitorial message to the duke of Pomerania (since the invasion of the Swedes seemed to point his way) commanding him in effect to consign into the hands of Torquato de Conti, the Imperial general in those parts, the strong towns of Gartz and Griffenhagen, which two places rendered him master of the river Wefer. But whilst the duke hesitated concerning his answer (for his private wishes, so far as he durst indulge them, attended Gustavus) Torquato's troops entered the towns by a sort of force, and resigned to the prince all the tolls by way of cajolment and consolation.

It was next proposed by the Imperial party, that the whole empire should oppose Gustavus as a common enemy. In order to obviate which attempt, the protestant confederators wisely suggested a second time, that the edict of restitution should be reversed : but the Austrians and representatives of the catholic league persevered inaccessible on that subject. Yet the tempest at length collected itself with united force, and all agreed (the emperor excepted) to permit it to discharge its fury on Wallstein's head. And the better to pave the way to this important decision (the arrival of Gustavus being notified to the emperor in due form by the elector of Saxony) it was thought expedient to lend an attentive ear to the representations of friends, and make some new laws with regard to military discipline. These laws in themselves were good enough, had it been as easy to enforce the practice of them, as it was to compile them : but the troops were already abandoned to avarice, extortion, rapine, and cruelty, so that it was next to impossible to produce a reformation among them. Nevertheless it was decreed by the diet, that the power of appointing and collecting the prescribed quota or contingent of men and money from every province should be exercised by civil officers, and not military ones; and that the emperor having made a reduction of some superfluous regiments, should signify to each circle the sum he proposed to levy from it: from whence it was expected, that the troops would all be paid punctually, and not in a fortuitous and tumultuous manner. Be this as it will, one misfortune attended these fine schemes, which was, they were never carried into execution.

Yet all parties co-operated towards the degradation of Wallstein; and Ferdinand at length found himself obliged to pave the way gently to that general's dismissal. For the elector of Bavaria * hated him mortally, as a new raised man, as a commander, and as a rival; and considered himself (Tilly being naturally modest, and his own creature and dependant) as the person, that ought to be supreme general of the Austrian forces and the catholic league. But the Spaniards favoured the archduke, inasmuch as his marriage had rendered him subservient to their interests; and the court of Madrid had the insolence to style herself Signora di orecchi di Cesare †. Wherefore upon the whole, it may suffice to say, that the major party seemed inclined to declare the elector of Bavaria generalissimo: nevertheless, that prince was too sagacious to accept an employment of so hazardous a nature; sufficiently contented, that he had a general at his absolute devotion, whom he could mortify by his displeasure, or persuade with his plausible and artful eloquence: for though war was not his talent, he was the ablest and most designing politician amongst the Germans; insincere likewise, dissembling, artful, and immeasurably self-interested.

* Maximilian, elector of Bavaria, a prince self-interested, it is true, and bigotted beyond imagination, but considerable likewise as being esteemed the shrewdest and most artful politician at that time in the empire. He had parts sufficient to have embroiled Germany more, if possible, than it then was; but his temperament was of such a cast, that he had always one perpetual difficulty upon his hands, and that was to harmonize religion and interest. His education had been somewhat above the princely level, for he understood all the dexterities of history and treaty-learning; he talked most of the modern languages, English alone excepted, extremely well, even the Hungarian and the Slavonian, and was remarkable for a correct Latin style. He had the rare felicity to outlive the very completion of the thirty years wars, which himself began: and died the third autumn after the conclusion of the peace of Munster, in the seventy-eighth year of his age.

1630. In order to reconcile Walstein's mind to so impetuous a shock, his Imperial majesty sent privately to him the barons Verdenberg * and Queftenberg †, both favourites with the general, and very particular friends to him, (for, in one word, they had all been reciprocally friends and patrons to each other) and ordered them to insinuate the strong reasons of state, which compelled their common master to assent to a proceeding so harsh and abrupt. Walstein influenced a little by Sepler, who then served him in quality of astrologer, received the message with profound submission and resignation; at the same time inveighing bitterly against the enemies of himself and his master, who, to ruin him, destroyed the whole Imperial power. He had retreated at that time like a private nobleman to Memmingen, in order to watch the resolutions of the diet, and transmit directions to his friends, who made their appearance there, and avert, if possible, the fatal blow that threatened him.

After some conference with the ministers of state, Walstein retired to a private room, and wrote to his master, " beseeching him to shew
 " so much justice and fortitude at least, as not to listen to those reports, " which courts and factions create instantaneously against a man of " any consequence, whenever disgrace begins to environ him: that
 " for his own part he concluded his employment to be perpetual;
 " nevertheless, he now resigned it cheerfully, and without retrospect:"
 affecting not to feel those certain pangs, which ambition usually gives men in its last struggles. " I beseech your Imperial majesty," continued he, " to dispose a part of your army in the neighbourhood of Ra" tishon, and distribute the rest on the confines of Bavaria, and con" tiguously to the territories of those princes, who seem to have an in" clination to counter-work your designs. One single motion of this " nature will impose silence on them all. The watch-word of the
 " faction is to alarm your Cesarean majesty with the name of Gustavus:"

* John Baptista Verdenberg, privy-counsellor and Aulic Austrian chancellor.

† Gerard Queftenberg, privy-counsellor.

These two ministers were employed afterwards to beseech him to resume the command.

“ let him advance farther into the empire, and I will scourge him “ back with a rod.” 1630.

Having sealed and directed this letter, he returned to his friends without delay; and after regaling them with extreme politeness, dismissed them with an unperplexed and open countenance, which was the more extraordinary, as his natural aspect was not of that cast in his most unguarded and undisturbed moments. In consequence of all that had preceded, the emperor was obliged to command him to resign the investiture of the duchy of Mechlenberg, under pretence of not giving umbrage to his Swedish majesty, or the electoral college. He then removed him from the command of the army, (a part of which was ordered to be disbanded) and declared for the future, that contributions should depend on the regulations made by the circles, and not on the will of a general; protesting likewise, that he would wage no war, without previously apprizing the electors.

We shall observe elsewhere, that this dismissal of a considerable part of the Imperial forces gave the first fatal stroke to the emperor's affairs, being one of those unprosperous measures, where all that was not weakness in one part of the proposers, proceeded from insincerity in the other part; no uncommon case in deliberations of state. Nevertheless, the emperor still retained an immense number of veteran troops, besides garrisons, and not comprehending the army that belonged to the league; which at that time were esteemed doubly or trebly sufficient to have chased Gustavus out of the empire. Yet the error was soon discovered by dear-bought experience; and the combined catholic armies the campaigns ensuing were advanced to the number of 160,000 fighting men.

One may attempt to account for Wallstein's profound submission several ways. In the first place, he found it impossible to stem the fury of the torrent; and in the second place, it is probable the emperor had given him private assurances of restoring him to power, as soon as the present tempest should begin to disperse itself: and lastly, it appears from some accounts, that his own astrologer predicted a sudden e-

1630. mersion from this eclipse; a circumstance sufficient to rest his hopes on, if the cast and turn of the age be duly considered!

At length, by the artful intrigues of Maximilian elector of Bavaria, (whom the emperor all along suspected of having an eye to the kingship of the Romans, and of tampering with France in a sinister manner) Tilly, who had been created a count at Vienna with the title of Illustrissimo *, was advanced to the supreme command of the Imperial armies in conjunction with that of the catholic league. He soon collected together a large body of forces, which lay dispersed through Bavaria and the Palatinate, and advanced directly into Misnia, in order to keep the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg in good submission. Thus ended the diet of Ratisbon, which met about June 19, 1630, and concluded November 13th next ensuing; giving birth to the assembly at Leipzig, convened February 8, 1631, and ending April 3d in the same year.

The protestants retired from Ratisbon, not greatly satisfied in four particulars; for war was denounced against Gustavus at a time they hoped to propose some accommodation: the emperor likewise requested money, provisions, ammunition, and soldiers from the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, which these princes considered as a new bill of very disagreeable demands. The revocation of the edict of restitution was still supported with vigour; and various reformations proposed in reference to protestant churches, schools and colleges; which last especially were intended to be realized in a future diet, which was to be held at Francfort on the Mayne, the month of August ensuing.

We left his Swedish majesty in full preparation to embark for Stetin, the antient residence of the dukes of Pomerania, and the capital city of the inner-duchy; into which place Torquato de Conti had fruitlessly attempted to throw a large body of troops two days before; but the vigilance of his unwearied enemy prevented him.

On the very day the king proposed to set sail, the wind, which had been tempestuous for a long continuance, then happened to blow directly against him, which afflicted him to such a degree, that he retired privately to his closet-devotions*. Towards evening the gale changed point blank, and the whole fleet ran twenty miles in two hours, arriving before Stetin under full fail in the most beautiful order. His majesty next morning invested the town with all his army, upon which colonel Damitz the governor (who had the command likewise of the district round) dispatched a trumpeter to him, with request not to approach within the reach of cannon-shot. The king with a tone of eagerness, demanded immediately, who sent him? (for the duke of Pomerania was in the city) and being informed of the governor's rank and condition, and that the message came from him and no other person, returned the trumpeter back with these instructions: Tell Damitz, it is not my custom to treat with men of his stamp by the intervention of an interpreter †.

Stunned with this answer, and the innuendo that lay concealed beneath it, the governor waited on the king without delay, who pointing to his troops, said, Behold, Sir, there is the key of my admission: nevertheless, he generously shook him by the hand at the same time.

Gustavus pressed Damitz to procure an interview betwixt himself and his master, for, Sir, said he, I treat only with principals; and agreed either to visit the duke in Stetin (for he had no fear of being entrapped) or give him a meeting in the open fields. During this intercourse, the magistrates and citizens all flocked out to see the king, and were charmed with his affability and good manners; for he spoke courteously to the meanest inhabitant of the town; and being informed the burgo-master was mixed incognito amongst the crowd, soon made it his business to discover him, gave him the compliment of his hat, and shook him heartily by the hand, with assurances, that he came to visit him and the good people of Germany in the character of a friend, and not in that of a king ‡.

During

1630. During this interval, the duke of Pomerania * arrived in a sedan-chair. But the king had the politeness to meet him half way, and told him before all his subjects, That he came to restore peace to the empire, and that his soldiers were neither ruffians nor banditti, as those were who belonged to some other princes. Upon this the duke begged to retire for a single hour, in order to confer with his counsellors of state upon so important an occasion; in which request he was indulged with frankness. On his return he told the king he durst not presume to adventure upon a step so hazardous: to which Gustavus replied, that though he should possess his country, he would restore it to him upon the strictest promise of honour; desiring nothing but a slight remuneration for his soldiers, and the prayers and thanks of the German nations; telling him likewise, that it was impossible for him to make resistance, and pointing out by name to him every weak part in the fortifications †. The duke then petitioned in the strongest terms to obtain the favour of continuing neutral. To which the king gave this short answer, He that is not with us is against us: and though this application of Holy Scripture may seem too light and ludicrous for a religious prince to make; yet I must caution my readers to observe, that it is a sort of proverbial expression in the High-Dutch language.

To relieve the seriousness of this conversation, the king, who observed the palace-windows to be crowded with ladies (for the conference was held just under the city-walls) touched the duke gently on the shoulder, and said with a smile, pointing towards the castle,

* The duchy of Pomerania is about 200 miles long, and 50 or 60 miles broad. Conformably to an ancient treaty of confraternity, it was allowed to devolve upon the house of Brandenburg, in case the dukes of Pomerania became extinct: which event happened during the confusion of the thirty years war. Nevertheless, the Swedes declined giving up the possession of this commodious territory, partly as it was their first conquest in the empire, and partly as being the only sure country into which they could retreat. At length by the peace of Munster, all Outer-Pomerania was granted to the Swedes, and the Inner only was conferred on the elector of Brandenburg. Nevertheless, by way of equivalent, the three bishoprics, Magdeburg, Halberstadt, and Minden, were secularized and bestowed upon him. As the Swedes in these latter days have been almost squeezed inch by inch out of Germany; so the Prussians have no ways kept their eyes closed against such favourable events.

company of my Dalecarnian infantry. But the duke was not to be charmed from his purpose with a stroke of gallantry, still urging the dilemma he was drawn into, and dwelling long upon his oath of allegiance, as well as the power and implacable resentment of the house of Austria. To whom the king, resuming a gravity of features, replied abruptly, *That he had 30,000 brave and good men under his command, who were ready, singly or conjointly, to sacrifice their lives at one glance of his eye. That the Supreme Power had made him a present of the isle of Rugen before he entered Germany, (for Lesly and the Stralsund troops had made themselves masters of it) and that it would hardly become him at such a juncture to leave his throat exposed to the enemy's knife. Well then, replied the duke, it is necessary to submit to superior power, and the will of providence.

Being thus upon the point of taking leave, Well cousin, said the king with great composure, keep your mind at ease, and give yourself no disturbance; my trust is, that God's providence will assist me, and prosper my designs. And, Sir, added he, with an air of pleasantry, behave yourself with greater magnanimity in the married state, (for the duke was old and expected no progeny) or else permit me to address you to adopt me for your son and successor †. A speech, to all appearance without meaning, and full of pleasantry! and yet it is probable, that Gustavus was never more sincerely in earnest than at the very moment he pronounced it. And here it must be remembered, that the emperor had once made the same request, but with unlike success.

In the evening, when the duke returned, lord Rea ‡, privately instructed by the king, under pretence of escorting him with due military honour, entered the town attending his sedan, at the head of 200 chosen men, all Scottish musqueteers. Thus, securing the outward gate for the rest of the army, the garrison immediately took the alarm, and submitted, enrolling themselves to the number of 1200 men 1630. amongst his majesty's troops, and taking the oaths to the crown of Sweden: and this regiment of infantry, from the colour of its ensigns, assumed afterwards the surname of the White brigade. His majesty then ordered his officers and soldiers to pitch their tents along the ramparts, because he did not chuse to incommode and molest the citizens, and for his own part slept aboard a ship in the mouth of the Oder, saying with great good humour, That a furred cloak for a general, and clean straw for a soldier, made excellent beds for the subjects of a king, who lay in an hammock. Nor was another saying of his less remarkable; for though he entered Stetin on the Saturday night, he went thrice to church upon the Sunday, assigning this reason to his officers and soldiers, That though war might be their amusement, yet religion was their business. And as Torquato with his hovering troops surrounded the town on every side, he on that very account, by way of gallantry, ordered the city gates to be set open.

His majesty upon examining carefully this capital of Inner-Pomerania, a place from its own nature and situation of great importance, soon perceived, that it was not fortified to his own liking, and in the manner it truly wanted. Discovering likewise, that the citizens and peasants were unexperienced in these matters, and of course not over-industrious or zealous on the occasion, he gave them to understand, that the town and district ought to raise money to defray the expences of the new fortifications, and that his own soldiers should be the architects and pioneers*. So calling for paper, he sketched out a plan extempore, and gave it his generals to reduce into practice without delay: and as carriages and horses were not to be procured, the removal and raising of earth was all performed by hand. His majesty passed the whole day with his soldiers, and ordered each man, after twenty turns of carrying the earth-basket, a comfortable draught of Bremen or Dantzic ale. Thus this immense piece of work was advanced more with the air of a festival, than like a task of drudgery, being made superior to the insults of the bravest enemy in a few days: and as Gustavus was known to be the best engineer of that age, it received such final additions and completions from his hands, that it was considered not only in the light of a town defensible beyond a state of danger, but as the model of just fortification during the succeeding part of the war. 1630.

Yet time was found in the midst of all this hurry to publish a second manifesto on the part of Sweden, and conclude a public act of treaty * with the duke, of which the substance was, “A renovation of “all antient agreements then subsisting between the kings of Sweden “and dukes of Pomerania: a perpetual alliance for themselves and “successors, defensive and offensive, so long as the emperor and em“pire should exist in their present relative situation and connections:
 “a restitution to the duke under certain assurances of all the places,
 “that should be obtained in Pomerania; and, in case the said duke “should die without heirs-male,” (he being at that time unblest with children, and advanced to the 50th year of his age) “that his “territory should then remain in the king’s hands by way of hypo-“theque, or mortgage, till reparation might be made by the elector “of Brandenburg (the inaugural successor at all events) for all the “expences incurred by Sweden in vindicating the aforesaid territory
 “from the cruel persecution of the house of Austria †.” The addition of this latter article may be considered as a master-piece in affairs of politics, for it prepared at due distance the incident of tying up the elector of Brandenburg’s hands, and naturally paved the way to some future accommodation with him.

Upon this event, Bogislaus duke of Pomerania dispatched a letter to the emperor, which letter contained a long and invidious deduction of the rapine and cruelty of the Imperial troops, representing alternately the sudden approach of the Swedish army on the one hand, and the negligence and inattention of the Austrian commander on the other hand; the impossibility of resisting a power so formidable as that of 1630. Gustavus ; not to mention fine promises of inviolable affection and allegiance ; with a gentle insinuation at last, which carried the air of a petition, obliquely suggesting the restitution of all the estates, which the Imperial house had usurped from him*.

But the emperor had more regard to hostilities and treaty-subscriptions, than to representations and remonstrances, and ordered Torquato (whom Walstein had made his substitute in those parts) to treat the duke as a declared enemy, to the utmost of his power : which in the event placed the Swedes in an amiable light, and rendered the Imperialists more odious. He had orders also to ruin the whole duchy of Pomerania ; which command he obeyed with great exactness. Nevertheless, the rendering the country desolate, and destroying all forage and provisions, did Gustavus but little harm ; for as he was master of the sea, he received copious supplies from his own dominions. Nor did Torquato chuse by any means to give him battle ; for being equally timid and avaricious, he dreaded to lose the vast treasure, which he and his officers had amassed by rapine and plunder : a fatal effect of licentiousness, which his majesty of Sweden well foresaw. And here some historians pretend not to conceive why Walstein did not defend his own duchy, and take the command upon him against Gustavus ; but to this difficulty we have given a solution in its proper place. For he lay all this time at Memmingen near Ratibon, to watch the motions of the storm, that was gathering against him there : nor did he think it worth his while to act in the capacity of a general, when he expected to receive the news of his removal and disgrace every day.

I shall now dismiss this subject with observing, that the states readily confirmed the agreement betwixt their master and the king of Sweden. The town of Stetin advanced his majesty 8316 pounds, and the district furnished him with an equal sum ; one half in present payment, and the other half to be disbursed at the feast of St. Michael next ensuing. They allowed him also a portion of the sea-duty on goods.

* Histor. or Authentic. Relat. Tom. i. p. 172.

About this time the Pomeranian ministers made many efforts to get Stralsund into their master's power, but Gustavus for certain reasons continued inflexible on that head; and as to the government of Stetin, it was made a sort of mixed monarchy between the Swedish commander, the duke, and the magistracy. To the latter was committed the civil government of the city, the care of erecting barracks for a garrison of 4000 men (whom the king was to pay, and the inhabitants to feed) and the providing guards and watches for the inner-parts of the town. The nominal supreme military command was allotted to the duke, as also the privilege of issuing out the watch-word. He and the magistrates had the conservation of the arsenal and city-keys, with provision never to open the gates, except by the consent of the Swedish governor. Thus the duke was generalissimo in title, but without power; for the soldiers were all triable at the commandant's court-martial; who likewise had the prerogative (it being set forth, that he was a person of most consummate experience) of disposing the artillery and watches in such places as best pleased him, with this further authority, that nothing, which was matter of military use, should be moved out of the town without his privity and consent*.

His majesty, whilst he continued at Stetin, began to grow impatient for action, and dispatched Banier and lord Rea cross the Oder at the head of 1200 infantry, to make themselves masters of Dam, a small fortification within sight of Stetin, and about six miles distant from it on the south-east side. A peasant offered to conduct this detachment over a morass, which having one narrow cause-way was deemed impassable in all other places: but as this proposal happened to take air, the inhabitants like good politicians sent Banier word (well knowing, that a town taken by storm became subjected to military plunder) that if he would postpone his visit till evening, they would open a postern-gate for his more quiet admission. Mean while the Imperial garrison perceiving how matters were like to proceed, dislodged very prudently before sun set, and threw themselves into Stargard, a stronger place, and more capable of resistance: for some days before the Italian colonel

* Chemnitius, Tom. i. 53.

1630. Piccolomini, had introduced by surprize a considerable garrison into it, and having seized the city-keys, which were in the magistrates possession, exacted a contribution from the inhabitants amounting to 1000 pounds. In consequence of these severities, a private express was dispatched to the king, requesting him to turn his arms against Stargard: but as Gustavus had some suspicion of the townsmen's good faith, he thought fit to employ the governor and garrison of Stetin (accompanied by a body of his own troops) in this expedition, partly as better acquainted with the town and its avenues, (being less liable also from their knowledge of the people to be amused or misled) and partly because he was willing to engage the Pomeranian forces in some open act of hostility against the emperor, in order to secure them more faithfully to his interests. This little body of troops having made a midnight march of about ten miles, scaled the walls at break of day, and put to the sword a considerable part of the garrison. Piccolomini, with two or three companies of infantry, retired to the castle, and at length capitulated. Some days likewise before the episcopal town of Camin, which lies on a promontory over against the island of Wollin (being the capital of a small principality) incurred the same fate. But the loss of Stargard, being one of the principal towns of Outer-Pomerania, was a more sensible inconvenience to the Imperial general; for it was the magazine of corn and provisions, and lay in the road between his two camps.

By this time his Imperial majesty plainly discovered he had been grossly abused with respect to Gustavus, whom he found to be formidable in every shape. Perplexed in his mind what measures to pursue, he at length dispatched a letter * to him by the hands of one of his courtiers, requesting a fuller explanation of all the king's reasons for invading the empire in so hostile a manner; alledging, that his Swedish majesty had no more to do with the affairs of Stralsund, and the intestine quarrels of the princes and states of the empire, than the emperor had to do with the internal government of Sweden; admonishing him at the same time to withdraw his troops and conclude a peace, or else threatening to exterminate him and his army out of the empire, by sending the whole weight of his mighty legions against him; inasmuch as the affairs of Germany regarded only the Germanic body. Gustavus received the letter with extreme politeness, and told the gentleman it required too many serious considerations and revisions to be answered immediately: Besides, Sir, said he, I am at this present juncture incapacitated; but will not fail to send a proper reply to his Cæsarean majesty the very first moment I am recovered of a wound, which an EAGLE hath given me in the hand, wherewith I hold my pen.* Upon which the courtier, without saying a word more, made his obeysances, and retired, perceiving plainly, that this allegorical excuse proceeded from the resentments the king had entertained on account of the detachment, which had been sent into Poland under Arnheim's conduct; and so much the rather, as the court of Vienna had denied the Swedes to raise recruits in the empire during the Polish wars †. And here it may not be improper to relate a few passages with regard to Ferdinand II. emperor of Germany, whom more from a sense of his power, than from an idea of any extraordinary abilities in him, Gustavus considered as his great antagonist. He succeeded Mathias in 1619. That monarch had two brothers, Maximilian, who died one year before him, and Albert; both unblest with children. Ferdinand was their cousin German, first prince of their blood, son of the late arch-duke Charles, prince of Stiria, who was brother to the emperor Maximilian, father of Mathias, Maximilian, and Albert. The said emperor Maximilian and Charles prince of Stiria were brothers sons of the emperor Ferdinand, and Anne heiress to the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary; which made out Ferdinand's title to those dominions.

This person had great concerns in history, and yet history reporteth little with respect to him. That he was a bigot is certain, as appears by a remark we have made elsewhere in a paragraph relating to cardinal 1630. Klefel . To which another anecdote may be subjoined of the same stamp. When the decisions of the Bohemian judicature were transmitted to Vienna, with reference to the intended state-massacre, which was decreed to complete the battle of Prague, he sent for his confessor (whose name was Lamormain) and adjured him by his conscience to inform him, whether he could safely sign the dead warrants, or as safely grant an universal pardon. To which that worthy and generous ecclesiastic replied, Utrumque in potestate tua est, Cæsar †. Yet the unmerciful alternative still took place : one hundred and eighty-five noble protestant families were sent to beg their bread in foreign countries ; and the principal personages of the kingdom signed the evangelical profession with their best blood on a public scaffold, not merely like Greeks and Romans, but with a serenity and vivacity no ways unbecoming the primitive Christians : of which I cannot refrain from inserting some few particulars, being such as it is highly probable have occurred to few people in the course of their reading.

When the inquisitors of justice examined count de Schlick with insupportable rigour, he tore open his cloaths, and laying bare his breast, made the following speech in so many words ; Tear this body of mine into ten thousand pieces, probe every vein and corner of my heart, you shall not find a single sentiment there, but what my right hand hath subscribed at the bottom of the apology. The love of liberty, and of God's religion, and of my country prompted that very hand to wield the sword : and since it hath pleased the Supreme Being to transfer success to the emperor, and deliver us into your hands, I can only say with submission, complacency, and reverence, the will of God be done ‡.

Many other unfortunate prisoners spoke much to the same effect, and all protested, That the justice of a national revolt could not derive its morality from the event of second causes ; and, what is still more remarkable, no one person acknowledged the crime of rebellion.

When that part of Schlick's sentence was read, which pronounced his body to be torn to pieces with wild horses, and his limbs affixed in vari-

FACILIS JACTURA SEPULCHRI :

and when father Sedatius, chief of the Jesuits, who had much laboured to effect his conversion, cried out hastily, at the time the executioner's hand was lifted up, Domine comes, recordare adhuc ; he replied to him and his associates with an air of severity, Jam me facite missum.

When supper was served up to these state-criminals the evening before the execution, they all declared, that they had no need of a material repast : nevertheless, lest the public might interpret their abstinence to proceed from fear, they were determined to take the refreshment of the table, and then endeavour to obtain a good night of repose. On the morning of execution they all dressed themselves in their richest apparel, and those, who were military men, wore such part of their armour and habit as might not create any retardment to the operations of the executioner.

The chevalier Kapler had an offer made him of receiving his life upon condition he could content himself with perpetual imprisonment ; but the answer he sent the vice-roy, the prince of Lichtenstein, was, “ That being an extremely old man, unable either to taste wine or relish meat, walking with pain, and sleeping with difficulty, he had but one favour to ask, which was to be beheaded.” The venerable Michaelovitzki, whom the king of Bohemia particularly loved, when the officers came to conduct a young nobleman to the scaffold, stepped before him with an air of vivacity, and said, seniores, priores : I demand the precedency of age. He had been one of the principal actors in all the public commotions next to Thurn, and had been joined with him as deputy burgrave of Carlstein castle, (a post of singular honour and profit, as the regalia of the crown are there preserved :) and was one of the three ambassadors, that had been sent to Francfort at the election of Ferdinand.

Kutnar, a senator of old Prague, for some particular reasons, was condemned to be hanged. When he mounted the scaffold, My good friends and countrymen, said he to the spectators, a strange death is al-

1630. lotted me; for whether I am to be suspended by the heels, the neck, or the ribs, is more than I know, and more than I care for, except it be, that I cannot have the reputation to leave the world as a gentleman ought to do. And another criminal of superior rank, when that part of the sentence was pronounced against him, which referred to the dismembering his body by wild horses, made a very lively answer without much emotion; Gentlemen, said he, send one limb to the pope, a second to the emperor, a third to the king of Spain, and a fourth to the great Turk; yet the Supreme Being will know how to re-unite them at the last day.

But to conclude these tragical scenes; the case of Dr. Jessen was more extraordinary. This gentleman (who was an Hungarian of noble extract) had been rector of the university of Prague, celebrated for his learning, and knowledge throughout all Europe; and being a physician had digressed naturally enough into the amusement of judicial astrology conformably to the vogue and practices of that age. In the year 1618 he had been sent ambassador to the Hungarians, and in his conferences with them had executed his commission with great success and dexterity: but it was his misfortune in his return homewards to be intercepted by some Imperial partizans; and thus he became a state prisoner at Vienna. The house of Austria thought fit to exchange him against an Italian of consequence, who served the emperor, and upon quitting the prison he writ thus on the chamber-walls, I. M. M. M. M.

The arch-duke Ferdinand, amongst others, made a visit to these initial letters in order to decypher them and expound them, and at length declared their originality and meaning to be, IMPERATOR. MATHIAS. MENSE. MARTIO. * MORIETUR. He then with eagerness drew a pencil from his pocket, and added a second reading and explanation; JESSENI. MENTIRIS. MALA. MORTE. MORIERIS. † which shews at least, that the future emperor had some readiness and vivacity of parts.

These circumstances were recalled back to men's minds, and much agitated, whilst the doctor lay under condemnation. Nevertheless his custom was to give one general answer to all enquirers; As my prophecy beld good with relation to the death of Mathias, his Imperial majesty, Ferdi- hand, will certainly pique himself to confirm his prediction likewise in reference to the extinction of poor Jessen. 1630.

In a word, the persecutions of the house of Austria had hardened the Bohemians into a state of heroism; and of course I shall relate but one striking example more in regard to cruelty: two officers held a naked infant by the legs, and one of them splitting it through with a stroke of his sabre, made use of this tremendous expression, Jam habes sub utraque; alluding to the communion under both species, which the unhappy protestants had requested with earnestness*.

These short instances may serve to give some idea of the temper and government of Ferdinand II. Mean while Gustavus received a joint-letter †, subscribed by the several electors, dispatched from the same place with that of the emperor, and bearing date August 3: in which, by the way, they had recovered their memories so far, as to give him the compellation of king; an honour they had withheld from him in the preceding part of their application to him. It was pretended, that the omission of the regal title did not proceed from any disregard or evil-intention of the heart, but from a certain form and parade of dignity, which the electoral body had assumed from time immemorial in their correspondence even with crowned heads. It is visible to the most inattentive reader, that the house of Austria held the pen in this querimonious and exhortatory epistle; for the electors blamed him on account of his interference in regard to Stralsund, for interrupting the deliberations at Ratisbon with an armed force, and for a needless interposition in respect to the restitution of his kinsmen, the dukes of Mechlenberg; and then advised him to evacuate the empire and repose himself on the humanity and equity of his Imperial majesty.

By this time Gustavus, it being near the middle of August, thought proper to form one general camp under the walls of Stetin (which he committed to the conduct of Gustavus Horn) having received a reinforcement from that commander of 8000 fresh troops out of Livonia; himself making excursions here and there, in order to reduce the neigh-

1630. boursing fortified towns into subjection. He had an earnest desire to make himself master of Gartz and Griffenhagen, two important cities, which commanded the river Oder; but did not think it expedient to hazard his troops on so adventurous a service in the very infancy of an invasion. He therefore left a part of his army encamped, as we observed before, to effectuate the conquest of Pomerania; and applied himself with the rest of his forces, (having first ordained a general fast,) to reduce the duchy of Mecklenberg, which lies contiguous to it, partly from a point of honour to recover the dominions of his kinsmen the deposed dukes, and partly with a view to attack Walstein's new acquisitions (an enterprize highly popular in the empire) and render himself master of the whole shore of the Baltic. Shaping his course therefore towards Stralsund, he attacked Wolgast, the capital of a duchy bearing the same name (whose fort he had taken before, and which town Banier had blockaded) and having rendered himself master of the city, at length obtained the castle by surrender, after discharging 8000 cannon-shot against its walls. Colonel Schleiücker evacuated the place, marching out at the head of five companies of infantry, which were reduced to 600 men; one half of whom immediately enrolled themselves in his majesty's service. Upon this the castle was repaired and furnished for the reception of the queen of Sweden, who was soon expected to make a visit to her husband, and become the partaker of his prosperous or evil fortunes.

By this time Torquato had withdrawn from his camp at Anclam, and entrenched himself under the cannon of Gartz; and, as he dreaded Gustavus in open field, determined (conformably to the practice of his country, for he was an Italian) to circumvent his opponent by fraud and stratagem, and either kill him, or make him his prisoner at all hazards. To this purpose one of his officers named Quinti Aligheri (some call him Quinti del Ponte) deserted by permission under pretence of some disgust, and was admitted lieutenant-colonel in Falkenberg's regiment of cavalry. He there found a countryman, who was a captain of horse, one John Baptista, whom, according to the custom of the wars, he chose for his comrade, and imparted to him the whole plot he had conceived, ceived. Some time afterwards Gustavus had a desire to take a view in person of Torquato's lines, in order to form the siege of Damin, where all Quinti's ill acquired wealth was deposited*; upon which this officer, who was a favourite with the king, being one of the party, contrived to leave his master, whilst he attended him on the road, by a seeming sort of accident; and riding full speed to the Imperial general gave him a brief information of the expedition intended. As his majesty had only seventy soldiers with him, Torquato dispatched immediately 500 chosen Neapolitan cuirassiers, whom the traitor Aligheri commanded †. The subtle Italian having disposed an ambuscade with great dexterity (for therein consisted good part of the military genius, before the arrival of Gustavus) entrapped the king on his return in a narrow defilé, where he could neither advance nor retreat. No private soldier made personally a braver defence than his majesty did; and in spite of a superiority more than six to one, the Swedes kept firm to their leaders, nor did a single man behave unworthily. Their resistance was so heroic and so obstinate, that the commander of the assailants was obliged to change his original plan (of taking his majesty alive) and try, if possible, to cut him to pieces. He twice or thrice determined to shoot him; but his presence of mind deceived him, when he attempted to make the dangerous and infamous experiment ‡; for he dreaded the look of a man like Gustavus, whom he had basely betrayed; and greatly feared that the cries of the combatants, and brisk discharge of the fire-arms, might collect some straggling partizans to the king's defence. Gustavus, after his horse was killed by two musquet-balls, fought for a considerable space of time on foot, nor had his soldiers opportunity or power to remount him. He for some moments was taken prisoner, though unknown, (and it is remarkable he never moved so sullenly, as when the enemy wanted to carry him off:) but his companions threw themselves round him, like men in desperation, and instantly recovered him; for every man, without consulting his friends, had determined to die conqueror.

1630. At length a Livonian colonel, posted at the head of a detachment, by the king's orders, to secure a retreat, greatly uneasy at discovering no signs of his master's return, commanded his men to advance with all convenient speed, and dispatched a troop of horse before in full gallop to procure intelligence; which attracted soon by the noise of the fire-arms, found his majesty with a surviving handful of men crouding round him, just upon the point of being destroyed. In that instant the colonel appeared, and soon routed the Neapolitans, without attempting to pursue them, concluding it honour enough to have preserved his sovereign.

This action in point of bravery was considered by the army as a very extraordinary one, that seventy men, taken at a disadvantage and by surprise, should maintain a fight of half an hour's duration against 500 chosen troops, animated with the hopes of taking no less person prisoner than the king of Sweden. As to Aligheri, he returned back to the Imperial service, and there continued; but his comrade John Baptista, according to the then military law, had the honour to be beheaded in the Swedish camp. Two Imperial banners were gained in this rencounter, and presented to his majesty, who, though charmed with the fidelity and bravery of his followers, received the compliment with an air of affliction; for other thoughts then occupied his mind, and obstructed his joy. I am sorry, said he, to have brought a set of brave men (for such my companions truly were) so far from their respective homes, and see them cut to pieces by unequal numbers. What might they not have lived to perform, if the warmth of my temperament had not delivered them inconsiderately to slaughter?*

But a misfortune more inglorious still threatened his majesty; for a German monk born at Amberg, originally nothing better than a taylor, had formed a design to deprive him of his life †.

This man in order to attract Gustavus's observation wandered about the camp under the appearance of an exile, having a book in his hand, and always affecting to pore therein. Some say his purpose was to give the king a packet of poisoned papers to peruse, a method of dispatch then in vogue amongst the Italian troops, who served the emperor, and which is supposed now in Italy * to be efficacious to a certain degree; others assert, that his intention was to have recourse to a more compendious method, the interposition of the Stiletto. Be that as it may, the attempt was suspected and the design acknowledged.

Whilst Gustavus employed himself in considering attentively the situation and the fortifications of the town of Gartz (which town as well as Griffenhagen the duke of Pomerania had besought him to free from the Imperial garrisons) a Swedish colonel had formed a design to take an outwork, which belonged to the former place, by surprize; and in order to obtain what he thought the securest advice, imparted his project to several officers, that served with him; but by some accident, either of treachery or inadvertency, the secret took vent, and the garrison being prepared for his coming, gave him a very unexpected reception. Nevertheless he made his retreat like a man, who understood the fighting part, and presented two standards to the king, who received them with a certain air of dissatisfaction, observing to the generals, that stood round him, That no retreat or defence could justify a commander, who had not power to lock up a military secret in his own breast †.

His Imperial majesty thought it now high time to cement his friendship more and more with the court of Madrid; and of course a contract of marriage was signed between Ferdinand his son, king of Hungary, and Anna Maria, sister to Philip IV. king of Spain. This princess embarked at Barcelona with a very numerous and magnificent fleet; but not being able to land at Genoa, on account of the plague, which then reigned there, pointed her course to Naples, and demanded permission of the Venetians to cross the Adriatic ‡. 1630. with timidity, ordered Pisani, general of the islands, to give battle to the fair lady's squadron, without any ceremony: nevertheless an offer was made to transport her to Trieste, in the galleys belonging to the state. Upon this, couriers were dispatched immediately to the courts of Vienna and Madrid; and as the politicians there did not chuse to convert a wedding into a sea-fight, the escort of the republic (which said republic defrayed the princess's expence with magnificence) was accepted with profound acquiescence: yet these retardments allowed her not to arrive at Vienna till the third week of the year ensuing, and then the nuptials were completed.

Led by some evil destiny of war, a small party of 300 Swedes entered the little town of Passéwalk, and began to fortify themselves therein: but a body of 3000 Imperialists detached from Torquato's army invested them unexpectedly; and either their resistance was so extraordinary, or the cruelty of the assailants so great, that not a single person out of the garrison escaped.

From this moment the war began to grow extremely bloody and sincerely in earnest. At length it was agreed, in consequence of the representations of the king of Sweden, to allow free and fair quarter on either side. Nevertheless the Imperialists were cruel enough to except the soldiers of the duke of Pomerania, and Gustavus by way of retaliation excluded the Croatians: For if, said he, the former are to be considered as a band of rebels, I shall esteem the latter as an herd of savages *.

About this time a singular adventure happened to 700 Scots, who, in coasting the Baltic from Pillau in order to join the main body of the Swedish army, had the misfortune to be shipwrecked near Rugenwalt †, which town was defended by an Imperial garrison.

These poor wretches lost their ammunition and baggage, and excepting a few wet musquets, had only pikes and swords, wherewith to defend themselves. What was still equally disagreeable, the enemies troops were quartered all round the country, and the king and his army removed from them at a distance of eighty miles. In this dilemma Robert Monro * their commander sent a message to the late Pomeranian governor, who was still in Rugenwalt with some foldiers, (acting seemingly under the Imperial directions) with orders to inform him, that if he would open a postern gate for him at night, and convey to him fifty firelocks and ammunition, he would engage to clear the town of its new visitants, and restore it in such manner as their two respective masters should afterwards agree.

Thus Monro by a singular fortitude and presence of mind took Rugenwalt by a midnight assault, and having dispatched a messenger to advertise his majesty of what had happened, obstructed all the passes, that approached the town, and maintained himself bravely and prudently there for the space of nine weeks, till his countryman colonel Hepburn, who commanded under Oxenstiern in Livonia and the adjacent parts of Prussia, relieved him with his own regiment, and having drawn together a small army of 6000 men, co-operated with Kniphausen in the blockade of Colbergen. Indeed, by peculiar good fortune, 400 German foldiers belonging to the Swedish army were driven by strefs of weather into the harbour near the town, which increased the garrison to 1100 men. And here one may just observe incidentally, that during the shipwreck of the Scottish troops, a serjeant's wife, without the assistance of any other woman, was delivered of a fine male-child, which she anxiously held in her arms, and conveyed safely to shore, and marched with it in the like manner four long miles the next day. And when lord Rea gave the king an exact account of the extraordinary manner, whereby the town of Rugenwalt was thrown into the possession of the Swedes, his majesty replied, with visible marks of joy in his countenance, That he now began to hope, that the Supreme Being gave marks of approbation in the support of his cause.

About this time Gustavus marched an army, consisting of 13,000 men, by way of bravado, up to the very front of Torquato's lines, (which stretched themselves round the fortifications of Gartz) and used 1630. all forts of provocation and allurements to draw the cautious Italian to a pitched battle. Gustavus performed this feat of chivalry merely to keep the troops in spirits; nor was it an unsuccessful artifice, according to the practice of war in that age; for he well foresaw, that Torquato would not depart from the strength of his entrenchments. However, in his return from this effort of military gallantry, he met by chance a kinsman of Walstein (some mistakenly call him a son) in a coach and six, escorted by part of a regiment. Orders were given to charge him instantly, and 150 persons were taken prisoners; but the young man quitted his coach, and owed his escape to the fleetness of his horse.

The greater part of Pomerania being now secured, his majesty turned his thoughts towards an irruption into the duchy of Mecklenberg, and having rendered himself master of the strong fortrefs of Stolpe, which commanded the narrow frith, through which he was to sail from Stetin, embarked 12,000 chosen men aboard his fleet, and passing by Wolgast and Stralsund, surprized Bart, and then took by storm the important towns of Damgarten and Ribnitz. These two places, connected by a bridge cross a small river bearing the same name with the last town, and removed from each other at a distance of about three miles, were in those days considered as the lock and key, that gave admission into the duchy of Mecklenberg on the Pomeranian side; the securing a passage over rivers being esteemed at that period the first part of military prudence. Gustavus attacked Ribnitz at midnight, and carried it, after a very sharp carnifado; for the Imperial colonel Merodé made an obstinate resistance, and was taken prisoner sword in hand. Nor must it be dissembled, that in the confusions of a night-attack some retaliations were made for the cruelties lately exercised at Passewalk. Nevertheless the king soon repressed the resentments of his troops, after a few of the enemy's men had been precipitated from the windows.

And here it must be observed, that the navigation from Stetin to Damgarten was an extremely difficult and dangerous undertaking, being all to be performed in a narrow channel, full of islands, sand-banks and promontories, not to mention in some places the whole pressure of the Baltic upon the shipping, in case the wind blew from the north, or any points tending towards the north. But Gustavus was by this time almost as much an admiral as a general, affecting independency alike both by sea and land; and having thus obtained a tolerably secure footing in the duchy of Mechlenberg, invited all the country by proclamations * to disavow Walstein, and re-acknowledge their antient possessors.

It is true the duke and states of Pomerania had besought his majesty to give Torquato battle (of which he made a brave proffer, without expecting it should be accepted) and drive him from the neighbourhood of Gartz, and Griffenhagen, both for the general quiet of the country, and the security of Stetin in particular: but the king had not phlegm enough to waste his time and sacrifice his men in watching the motions of an intrenched wary Italian. Besides he knew from good authority (for no prince ever procured better intelligence) that the inhabitants of Mechlenberg wished to see him, having been long dispossessed of their natural princes, and long groaned under the intolerable domination of Walstein. He foresaw too, as he governed all his campaigns by political good sense, that a vigorous attack upon that general's territories would be highly agreeable to some of the enemies, and all the friends of Sweden. He had a by-view likewise in approaching nearer and nearer to the territories of William landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, whose father Maurice was then alive, but had resigned the government to him in 1628. Herman Wolf, the landgrave's minister, besought the king's protection and assistance, and made overtures of co-operating with him with an army of 8000 men. A treaty was instantly committed to paper without hesitation on either side, but was not signed and confirmed till the ensuing year.

Amelia Elizabeth of Hanau, the widow of this prince (for he died in 1637) proved the best ally that Sweden ever obtained in the course of twenty German campaigns. Her designs were great and generous, and executed with such precision, firmness and fidelity, that she became the ornament and glory of the protestant cause. Her husband William left the minority of his son to her regency, and, if I mistake not, the kings 1630. of England and France were requested to make a revision thereon. She waged war boldly against the emperor and the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt concerning the district of Marburg, and obtained at the peace of Westphalia the abbacy of Kirchfeld, and four signories to be annexed forever to her dominions. She gained likewise by way of indemnification upwards of 90,000 l. to be raised in nine months from the dioceses of Mentz, Cologn, Paderborn, Munster, and Fulda: resigning the power of government to her son in 1650, and surviving duke Bernard de Weymar (who had an ambition to marry her) about twelve years*.

Mean while Torquato attacked Horn in his entrenchments at Stetin, but was repulsed with considerable loss; and having dispatched the duke of Savelli into the duchy of Mecklenberg (which was, properly speaking, the duke's district of command) in order to counteract the king's motions, wasted the rest of the campaign in a sort of desponding inactivity, and took here and there a defenceless town, merely for the sake of extorting money; dealing in nothing except little incursions, surprisings, and matters of plunder and contribution.

The king next turned his eyes upon Rostock (by the natives supposed to signify the town of roses) a considerable city, adorned with a provincial university; removed from the Baltic about four miles, and distant from Ribnitz something more than twenty. But Savelli frustrated this intended siege; for demanding permission of the magistrates to march a detachment through their town, in order to secure Doberan, the thousand horse, who entered first, seized the grand gate by violence, and gave admission to the infantry. His majesty wrote to the magistracy on the occasion, who seemed willing to admit him, but knew not how: upon this he changed the siege into a blockade; ordered part of his fleet to possess the harbour, and erected redoubts and strong fortifications upon all the principal roads that approached the town. By these methods the garrison began to be extremely straitened, and Savelli, with a view to merit the good graces of Wallstein, dispatched 4000 men to cut a passage for themselves, and throw some relief both of provisions and soldiers into the town. This detachment the Swedes handled very roughly (his majesty being returned to his camp at Stetin) and Banier received orders to continue the blockade. 1630.

I should have observed before, that Gustavus, highly pleased with these prosperous beginnings, and confirmed in his good opinion of the loyalty of the Mechlenbergers, published a second manifesto relative to his entrance into their territories, which contained little more than a bitter invective against the usurpation and tyranny of Walstein, whose pretensions to the dukedom he treated with sovereign contempt and disdain, and called his soldiers land-buccaneers, ruffians, and murderers*.

In the way to Stetin, the king reposed himself for a short space at Stralfund, and after a consideration of three and thirty days from the time of date, dispatched his reply †, during this interval of recollection, to the joint letter of the several electors. He there tells them, (as fresh letters had arrived during the interval of his majesty's silence, full of excuses for omission of terms of ceremony, and requesting him at the same time to depart from Germany) That he was not displeased to find they had at length discovered him to be a king, (for his name in these second letters was placed anterior to their own) and had not denied him the title, which the Supreme Being had bestowed on him.

In addition to what hath been already mentioned, the substance of his answer was, “ That the suppression of the regal title was an affair “ merely external to those, who had private qualities of a moral and “ religious nature to value themselves upon; and that the annihila“ tion of a phrase of respect and good breeding neither demeaned “ him, nor exalted them. He then concluded with a recapitulation

1630. " could be procured for himself and his allies, he would discontinue the war as cheerfully as he had undertaken it unwillingly."

Two days afterwards he wrote to Louis XIII *, cardinal Richelieu *, and Charles I. As to what he transmitted to the latter personage, I can say nothing, it being only in my power to relate the fact. In his letter to the French king, " He desired leave to raise recruits in France; and told him roundly, he was surprized De Charnacé his ambassador had made a difficulty in a point of meer form, which to him appeared absolutely incomprehensible."

To understand this matter, which is only hinted at obliquely in the letter, with an equal degree of delicacy and politeness, I must have recourse for the satisfaction of my readers to other authorities †, and observe, that De Charnacé, in the rough-draught of the treaty, had inserted the word protection on the part of France; and insisted likewise, that the name of his master should precede that of Gustavus, even in the ratification, which the latter was to sign. To this his Swedish majesty answered lively and with some emotion, That he knew no protection but that of the Supreme Being; and as the two contracting parties were both kings, so they were both equal in dignity; and that precedence in this case was a thing not to be understood. To which De Charnacé replied, conformably to the petulance of his nation, That all scarlet was not of the same value. Gustavus nettled with such an animated impertinence, and at the same time being the prince in the world the most jealous of his dignity, told him with an air of determination, That he chose rather to dispense with the assistance of France, than tarnish the glory of the antient crown of Sweden; it appearing matter of astonishment to him, that his Christian majesty should desire him to resign a title, which he held only from heaven. These difficulties being smoothed, or rather acceded to, by the French, the treaty arrived to its full maturity in the commencement of the ensuing year.

In his letter to Richelieu †, he renews the same complaints concerning the false imaginations and wrong-headed obstinacy of M. de Charnacé, and beseeches the cardinal to put an end to such ridiculous obstructions, which tend in their own nature to create delays and misunderstandings. 1630.

As Tilly had orders from Vienna and Munich to approach Torquato de Conti as expeditiously as possible, Gustavus was determined to hinder that junction, which he had reason to be alarmed at; since two powerful armies in the neighbourhood of Saxony and Brandenburg might have hindered the electors from coming to an accommodation with him, a circumstance of union he ardently wished to see realized; and which he was almost morally sure of effecting, upon supposition he could either obstruct or traverse the motions of Tilly. In order therefore to form a diversion of this nature, he set himself to contrive that general some business in the duchy of Magdeburg, and to that purpose persuaded the administrator Christian William of Brandenburg to make himself master of the capital, and prevail on the inhabitants and their neighbours to take up arms. A Swedish ambassador attended him in this expedition. The magistrates and people soon complied, and raised a body of 2000 foot, and 2500 horse.

The city of Magdeburg had been the subject of great contests some years before; for the house of Brandenburg (as we have observed) had fixed a kinsman there in the administration, who was uncle to the then elector, and had found his interest long declining at the court of Vienna, having made himself an associate of the league at Lawenberg, and formed an alliance with Christian king of Denmark. Upon this account Ferdinand recommended his son, the archduke Leopold, to be co-adjutor; but the chapter remonstrated against the proposal, and petitioned for Augustus, second son then living of the elector of Saxony, because he was a protestant.

The old administrator had made a visit to Gustavus at Stockholm, just before the expedition into Germany, and had implored assistances of men and money. He received great encouragement in both par-

His majesty at that time either could not, or, to speak more properly, chose not to answer the demands of the administrator, who required money to raise an army of 10,000 infantry, and 3000 cavalry: nevertheless, he gave him letters of credit on several bankers and merchants, to raise such part of the sum as could be possibly amassed, for the payment of which he made himself responsible †.

This exiled prince was kindly received by all the inhabitants of the duchy; and the troops he had collected in the king's name and in his own, made several excursions, and drove the enemy out of many important posts. But their commander, though no young man, was a new warrior; undertaking more than he could conquer, and more than he could have maintained in case he had proved successful in his first enterprizes: for the elector of Bavaria had long foreseen the effects of this menacing insurrection, and had sent Pappenheim ‡ at the head of 6000 men to give a check to such tumultuary revolutions, and co-operate with Torquato and Savelli in such a manner, as to give the former a freedom of motion, by creating an opportune diversion. Pappenheim, the ablest and the readiest general in those days, next to Gustavus, soon compelled a novice in the art of war to contract his conquests, and at length reduced him to shelter his troops under the walls of Magdeburg, round which he formed to a certain degree a fort of blockade.

His majesty perceiving the prince to be thus straitened, and well foreseeing, that the preservation of the duchy of Magdeburg might have great influence on the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, dispatched colonel Falkenberg, grand maréchal of the household, an officer of approved bravery, to direct the administrator with his counsels, support the spirit of the inhabitants, and promise them an expeditious relief; which foon afterwards, from a concurrence of embarrassing circumstances, it was not in his power to realize. I speak not here of the grand relief, which he destined to send to the inhabitants in the month of May ensuing, when Tilly besieged the town in form; but purely with a view to the present blockade. Nevertheless, it was impossible for his majesty to leave the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony to chuse their party, being both of them at that time in a state of uncertainty: and, what was still worse, it was not in his power just then to convey to the inhabitants of the town a considerable sum of money, which put the burghers out of humour, who expected prompt payment from every foldier.

To make this diversion in behalf of the Swedish cause still stronger, Francis Charles, duke of Sax-Lawenberg*, was employed to enlist a body of soldiers in the districts round Hamburg and Lubec. The prince had the good fortune to take Ratzburg (a place of residence belonging to his family) by surpris; a city of some consequence and natural strength, being situated like Mantua in a large lake. Him colonel Reinach was sent to oppose and harass with his own regiment

* In these wars were several dukes of Sax-Lawenberg; as the reigning duke, named Augustus. And he, after many attempts towards a neutrality, at length espoused the Swedish cause; as did also Francis Charles, the person here mentioned, who married the widow of Gabriel Bethlem, (with whom he received a fine dowry) and then the relict of Teuffel, who was born countess of Megau. He made himself a convert to the church of Rome, and Francis Henry, a Swedish colonel, to whom Gustavus gave the estates belonging to the convent of Marienflayes in Pomerania. On the other hand Rodolphus Maximilian served under Tilly, as did also Francis Julius, who was killed by the peasants near Lintz. Next came the youngest son Francis Albert, whom we shall speak of more minutely hereafter, as he was supposed to have some concern in the king's death. In the year 1625, this prince commanded a regiment of light horse under Walstein. He was an officer of good esteem at the siege of Mantua, and acted next to Arnheim in the Polish campaign of 1629. As to the duchy of Lawenberg, it appertains now to his Britannic majesty; the family of Lawenberg becoming extinct at the decease of duke Francis Julius in 1689; which is the more extraordinary, as his grandfather Francis II. had twelve sons and seven daughters, many of whom married and were blessed with an abundant offspring. Yet the whole family became extinct in fifty years. On this event only eight competitors preferred their claims to this territory, of whom the chief were George William duke of Zell, and Augustus king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, who being occupied in other matters, sold his pretensions to the duke of Zell for something more than 150,000*l.* And as about this time a new electorate was erected in favour of the house of Brunsvic-Lunenburg, the duchies of Zell and Lawenberg, in the year 1715, on the death of George William, fell, with all rights of succession, to the electoral branch of Hanover.

1630. newly raised in Frizeland, and a thousand other soldiers. In his support Pappenheim advanced, and as he exceeded most generals in secrecy and celerity of marching, soon trode on the duke's heels, at a time when he expected nothing less than a visit from him. The first step that vigilant commander took was to surprize a convoy, that came to Lawenberg's assistance; and then making a second uncommon effort in a forced march, secured the foot of Ratzburg bridge, and the port-cullis which defended it, before the garrison perceived him. The possession of this bridge, which was 300 paces long, and the only way of entrance into the town, soon gave him a power to prescribe laws to it. Upon this, duke Augustus, who not long before had refused to give his brother entrance into the castle, found himself obliged to admit Pappenheim, for he did not care to exasperate the emperor. Francis Charles made an appearance of defending the town (though in truth it was not defensible): nevertheless, when all things were prepared by the Imperialists for a general assault, he sent to demand a truce, which Pappenheim granted him for the space of one single quarter of an hour. In that interim the duke attempted to escape to Lubec in a small pleasure-boat; but the steersman being killed by a falcon-shot, he thought it most prudent to drive to shore, and surrender himself to Pappenheim, who promised him, conformably to that generosity peculiar to brave men, that neither the emperor, nor elector of Favarina, should hurt him; engaging likewise for the security of his life, and an exemption from perpetual imprisonment.

The king, in order to be something nearer to these operations, made a second visit to Stralsund, from whence (it being now the last day of October) he thought fit to answer * the emperor's letter, which bore date August the 8th, having delayed returning a reply to him eight and forty days from the period he had dispatched his justification to the several electors: an affected indifference, purposely made use of by his majesty, partly with a view to mortify the Austrian pride, (as the emperor had only bestowed upon him the title of Our Prince) and partly because he saw no ground-work whereon to establish a solid accommodation. 1630.

It may suffice to say, with reference to this extraordinary epistle, that he upbraided the emperor with great spirit and acrimony at first setting out, and gave him to understand, "That it became not the " Cæsarean majesty to suppress the title of king in his applications to " him, since that implied a sort of dependency on the Germanic em" pire; whereas at the period alluded to, he was not master of a single " inch of land in the empire: nor was it a reason, if the case had " been otherwise, that an outrage should have been committed on his
 " regal character. Alledging afterwards in the strongest terms, that " the emperor had waged war against him in Poland and Prussia, with" out any formal declaration of hostilities. That for these reasons
 " he could not be accused of transgressing the laws of nature and na" tions, inasmuch as he paid back and repelled military interferences,
 " but did not commence them. He then recapitulated briefly the fe" veral arguments of his manifesto, but in a manner more pointed,
 " more spirited, and more ad hominem; and finished his letter with
 " observing, that he had no inappetency to a general accommo" dation, if his allies, kinsmen, and friends, could be effectually
 " redressed, and himself convinced of the Imperial friendship, which
 " at present appeared to him of an equivocal and fallacious na" ture, since the house of Austria raised armies, and pretended to " languish for peace, at the same moment: That for his own part
 " he would deal in realities, and not uncertainties, and consent on no " account to the proposals of a truce, or the dismissal of a single
 " foldier."

None but the truly brave and great can be thus firm and explicit in cases of the most trying emergency! Artifice and political cunning always acknowledge such a superiority of conduct with an abject astonishment! For the short and honest way is always the true one, if men have parts to reach their object.

Highly satisfied therefore with affording the emperor so distinct an explanation, Gustavus gave audience next to a public minister from 1630. Brandenburg, who made the elector's congratulations to him, and besought him to consider his master as a neutral power. His majesty granted the request with great frankness; but, Sir, said he, be pleased to tell the elector at the same time, that henceforward no connivances, no indulgencies must be shewn to my enemies, and no advantages must result to them.—Tell him, moreover, effectually, (and not superficially) That he must dismiss the Imperialists from every part of his dominions, and allow them, under no pretext, either provisions, or quarters, or money. If he cedes one town to the emperor's convenience, let him resign another of equivalent importance to me; and if he furnishes the Imperialists on one hand, let him supply my Swedes on the other. Tell him, Sir, these are Gustavus's notions of a neutrality: and upon these terms, though he does not offer him friendship, he promises him safety.

It may readily be foreseen, that the proposals to the emperor on the part of Sweden were rejected with an high air of disdain; in consequence whereof Camerarius was sent ambassador to the Hague, with a view to solicit some powerful assistances from that quarter.

In his harangue * dictated to him by the king, and pronounced in full assembly of the states general, he told them with an air of candour and firmness, “That his majesty at that period was attempting “ only to realize a scheme of supporting the distressed and afflicted, “ conformably to the request and exhortation of their high mightinesses
“ some years before.—That the said prince his master had besought “ them in the month of May preceding, to dispatch their representatives “ to the conferences his Danish majesty had procured to be “ held at Dantzic; whither (as it is supposed) no deputies ever arrived “ on the part of the United Provinces.—He then acknowledges, “ that the letter of his master made its appearance at the Hague some “ days too late; but attributing that delay merely to accidents, insists “ strenuously, that no inconveniency had thence arisen to the states general:
“ at the same time obliquely but politely expostulating with “ them on the subject of not returning an answer to his Swedish majesty.”

* We have preserved it at full length in the Appendix. It was pronounced in October 1630.

Recovering himself from that digression, which, though sincerely intended, had the appearance of being casual, “ he exhorts them to give some important diversions to the enterprizes of Spain and Austria ;” since if the arms of Sweden should prove unsuccessful, the whole torrent of war might pour itself on the Low Countries;—and then observeth, with great modesty, “ that the king his master, far from flattering himself with presumptuous hopes, considered the success of the field as a periodical sort of prosperity; nevertheless, that he had cast the die, and passed not only a Rubicon, but the Baltic ocean.”

And as there are reasons to think, that Gustavus was somewhat piqued at the inattention of the Dutch, both with regard to forms of respect, as well as due vigilance to the public welfare of Europe in general, Camerarius concludes with telling them, “ That being then on the wing of departure, it might not be improper to appoint deputies to hold a conference with him the first moment, that appeared convenient.” And thus the affair ended, in no degree to the disadvantage of Gustavus.

Whilst his majesty remained at Stralsund a public fast for three continued days was observed in Sweden, and on his return to Stetin he appointed a second general humiliation, and ordered divine service to be solemnly celebrated at the head of every regiment. He then gave directions to a part of his army to push on vigorously the blockade of Colbergen *, which Torquato de Conti, and all the troops, that served under him, had made their magazine of wealth and plunder. The garrison consisted only of 1700 infantry, and a few horse.

The Imperial general, for the reason above assigned, was very desirous to raise the blockade, or throw 7 or 800 dragoons into the town: but that attempt was difficult, as Kniphausen and Bauditzen had closed up all the avenues with an army of about 12,000 men. It not being easy therefore to render this enterprize practicable, Ernest, count de Montecuculi †, 1630. was dispatched at the head of a detachment, consisting of 10,000 men (being the regiments of Colorado, Isolani, Goëtz, Spar, and Charles Walstein) who marched in full hopes of cutting the Swedes to pieces by way of surprize, and rendering ineffectual a very long and tedious blockade. But Horn, who lay at Stetin, soon procured intelligence of this enterprize, and having summoned a council of war, sent the generals advice to march out of their lines, and give the enemy battle. Upon this a draught was made of the moiety of soldiers in each regiment (for such was the king's practice in this invention) every colonel being to conduct his own division; and as they were commanded men, to use the expression of the age, it was their custom to march without colours. By these means a general, upon any emergency, had the choice of the better half of his army, and the more experienced officers of rank and seniority; who by their presence not only kept the common men in spirits, but did them honour; and if the service proved sharp and unmerciful, no regimental corps was quite annihilated, but destroyed only in part.

The army being thus draughted, the remaining moiety, with Lesly at their head, and under the direction of their respective lieutenant-colonels, defended the lines of the encampment: so that the Swedish detachment being re-inforced from Horn's army, and by several handfuls of soldiers selected from the neighbouring garrisons, made in the whole about 11,000 effective men. Serjeant-major-general Kniphaufen, who commanded it in chief, revolved much in his mind the nature of the road, by which the enemy intended to approach him, and having requested Sir John Hepburn to examine well the pass and fortrefs of Scheifelbein, orders were given to lieutenant-colonel Monro, to throw some companies of infantry into the town and castle, to whom Kniphaufen gave milies in Modena, and passed regularly from the musquet to the partizan and baton; being at length general of the artillery and chief commander in Alfatia. His valour led him into an indiscreet rencounter near Colmar, where after having received two wounds from a sword and three musquet-shots, he had the misfortune to be taken prisoner, and died partly with grief, in the year 1633. He must not be confounded with his nephew Raymond count de Monteculi, of whom we shall speak hereafter in the storming of Brandenburg &c.

a short billet in writing to this effect: Maintain the town as long as you can, but give not up the castle whilst a single man continues with you *.

Upon the whole, this place was not defensible in general for a longer continuance than twenty-four hours; yet Monro having occupied it three days before Montecuculi's arrival, made a very laudable appearance of resistance, and when the Imperial general had ranged his army round the walls, in order to give one united assault, and sent a trumpeter to propose a treaty, the brave Scot replied with great plainness, That the word treaty by some chance had happened to be omitted in his instructions, and that he had only powder and ball at the count de Montecuculi's service. Upon this orders were given to commence a general storm, but the Scottish troops behaved to admiration, and having laid the town in ashes, retired with great composure into the castle. The Imperialists perceiving the governor to be a man determined, broke up their encampment, and relinquished the siege.

This slight effort of resistance gave the Swedes an incredible advantage, for in that interim Kniphausen received Horn's assistance, and obtained a short space for cool deliberation; it being no small error in Montecuculi to have lost time in tampering with Monro, who had resolved to give a respite to his comrades, or perish in the ruins of Scheifelbein-castle.

Both armies were now in full march with different designs. As to the Swedes, the supreme command being vested in Kniphausen, the baron Teüffel led the German infantry, lord Rea the English and Scots, and Bauditzen conducted the horse. About midnight they received intelligence from a peasant, that the Imperialists had taken up their lodgings in some little dorps hard by them; a piece of intelligence in no degree unacceptable; since if these two bodies of troops had missed one another, the Imperialists probably might have forced the camp, that remained round Colbergen, and thrown relief into the town. A council of war being summoned immediately, Kniphausen gave it for his opinion (for he was an officer of equal calmness and valour) that a midnight battle might prove a tumultuous and indecisive affair; since, supposing the worst

1630. to happen, that could be imagined, it would still be sufficient glory to maintain the siege, and render the enemy's design abortive: observing further, that they knew neither the strength nor the situation, nor the precautions taken by their adversaries; and if by any misapprehension or error they should chance to be defeated, that then Colbergen, and even Stetin, would be irrecoverably lost. This opinion with some difficulty prevailed. Mean while the self-same peasant, as it is imagined, deserted to the Imperialists; who took the alarm, and at three in the morning left their encampment in flames. All were ready to blame Kniphaufen, though perhaps unjustly: for appearances in war amount to demonstrations in weak and over-hasty minds, Nevertheless it was resolved at last, to march in pursuit of the flying enemies: and the Swedes the next morning, by eight o'clock, overtook them on a large heath, continuing their retreat with prudence and diligence, and skirmishing in good order; but coming to a defile, and some carriages breaking and choking up the road, the Imperialists found themselves obliged to confront their pursuers in good earnest. The Croatians, unaccustomed to serious fighting, turned their backs according to custom; but the foot-soldiers ranging themselves in a morassy plain, determined to obtain honourable conditions, or sell their lives as dearly as they could. In this interim one of the darkest mists sprung up, that ever was known. The Imperial infantry demanded quarter, and offered to serve his Swedish majesty in the same rank, and under the same conditions they had served the emperor; protesting at the same time, that if these proposals were not acceptable, they would maintain the fight to the last man. Whilst these matters were in agitation Bauditzen, intirely ignorant of what had happened, returned from pursuing the Croatian horse, and seeing the gros of the enemy's army drawn up in fair battalia and unbroken, attacked them immediately with great resolution. The Imperialists suspecting treachery, and finding themselves surrounded on every side, having altered their first arrangement, formed immediately into Burgundian squares, and returned a furious uninterrupted fire. Nevertheless Bauditzen entered them with his body of cavalry; and upon these frequent charges, the other half of Bauditzen's horsemen, which composed the opposite wing of the Swedish army, supposing the enemy to have halted, and put themselves in a posture of disputing the victory (which opinion was confirmed by the flight and fear of dispersed soldiers, as is usual) fell immediately on the troops of their own army, who hemmed in the Imperialists on the point directly over-against Bauditzen. And thus a dreadful conflict ensued amongst mutual friends, and servants to the same master, which cost many a brave man his life. What promoted the mistake was, that the Swedish army, as we hinted before, carried no colours on that day; such being the custom in Gustavus's service, when armies of expedition were composed of battalions draughted from several regiments. In this confusion and panic all the Swedish troops behaved reciprocally well and ill, excepting the van of the infantry commanded by Teüffel, and Bauditzen's large brigade of horse, conducted by lord Rea, and Sir John Devereux an Englishman. The Imperialists, under favour of this mistake, retreated with much less loss than human wit could well have imagined in such circumstances.

Thus the Swedes lost a complete victory, partly by the intervention of the mist, and partly by not carrying the respective colours that belonged to each regiment: but whether the king ever altered this oversight, (in case it be thought one) is more than we can take upon us at this distance to determine.

And thus concluded a rencounter of a very uncommon and disagreeable nature, where comrade killed his comrade, and friend his friend: nor can I agree with a brave Scottish officer, who in his relation of this engagement, where he happened to be present, calls it a mighty pretty and comical sort of a battle. But be that as it will, public thanksgivings were decreed to God throughout the several Swedish armies, with great seriousness and solemnity*.

And here it must be observed, that during the interval, which Monro's vigorous resistance procured, the king flew to Horn's camp, and placed himself, in conjunction with that general, at the head of a body of cavalry, in order to bear a share in so important a transaction: but an

* Heylmanni Leo Arctous, p. 17.

1630. express from Kniphaufen advertised them on the road, that he had compelled the enemy to retire.

Upon this Kniphaufen returned to his antient camp, where he received a considerable re-inforcement from his master, and was replaced by Horn, who having changed the blockade into a regular siege, and intercepted a convoy of 180 waggons laden with provisions, obtained the town of Colbergen (which had been three years in fortifying) by capitulation, agreed upon in the month of March the year ensuing, after an obstinate resistance of five months continuance. The garrison, consisting of 1500 good soldiers, received an escort to Landsberg; but to augment the governor's chagrin, four Imperial ships arrived the next day after signing the articles, well provided with a re-inforcement of soldiers and military stores. The Swedish vessels, which guarded the coast, gave them full opportunity to steal into the harbour, which is formed by the mouth of the river Perfant; and thus they were entrapped between a naval and land fire, without any possibility of escaping. And some time after that, the garrison was arrested at Friedberg in the New Marche, on account of the massacre committed by Tilly in the storming of New Brandenburg.

But to return back to the month of November 1630; his majesty having cast his eyes a second time on the duchy of Mecklenberg and the counties adjacent, returned once more to Stralsund, and thence directing his march to Stetin, made a fresh revision of its fortifications. A person blessed with a discerning genius like Gustavus, soon saw room for some additions and improvements, and in despite of a very rough approaching winter, converted his whole army into pioneers and military architects. During the main strefs of this work it was told the king, that a captain had been imprisoned for giving his company a bad example, complaining indirectly of the severity of the season, and the hardship and servility of the employment. My good friend, said the king, the earth is always frozen to those, that want industry. It is ridiculous to postpone till to-morrow what ought to be executed the present moment: on the contrary, it is impossible to pursue one's point with too much earnestness. It is persevering persevering alacrity alone, which performs all that is great and shining. Most things might be effected by men, upon supposition that indolence did not retard them, nor fear dismay them.* 1630.

It was about this time, according to the relation of an † historian well versed in the affairs of the present period, that his majesty received from England the sum of 60,000 l. with advice likewise concerning the body of recruits then to be raised by the marquis of Hamilton. He was favoured likewise with a good supply of 48,000 l. from another quarter; but whether it came from Sweden I cannot say, or elsewhere. Nevertheless it induced him to make a general review of all his troops, and having distributed a part of these sums among them with uncommon frankness and generosity, the disobliged and disbanded Imperialists soon flocked to his ensigns from every quarter; insomuch that sixty cavaliers in a body, each completely armed and mounted, made him a tender of their services in one morning.

Astonished with such vigorous proceedings old Torquato de Conti, weakened with infirmities, or, in truth, rendered sick of a war, where he made no figure, besought the emperor to excuse him from the command of the army. From thence he retired to Rome, took an employment under the pope, where the service was more pacific, and died there the last of his family. Hannibal count de Schomberg succeeded him in command, and having removed his camp from Anclam, entrenched himself near Gartz; ill-provided (according to the hereditary management of the house of Austria) with provisions, money, ammunition, baggage-waggons, and draught-horses ‡.

About this period the king exhibited a shining example of lenity and Christian moderation towards the inhabitants of Lubec, who, though all protestants, had refused his officers the power of enlisting soldiers. It was easy at a single stroke to have crushed this unkindness of theirs, which Gustavus calls inhumanity; but on the contrary he graciously tells them, that though the proofs on his side of the allegation were incon-

And at the same time he took care to cultivate a spirit of religion in his own army, and gave orders to the consistory of clergy, which attended his camp, to draw up a fresh body of prayers, three and twenty in number, by way of supplement to those already published; most or all of them relative to the occasions of war †.

It was now the 23d of December, but his majesty far from paying attention to the severity of an uncommon German winter; for it was a customary saying with him, that he could perform greater actions in a winter campaign than a summer one ‡. Of course he crossed the Oder, at a time the Imperialists concluded he would repose his troops in warm quarters, according to the then established method of making war; and reviewing his strength a second time, which consisted of 12,000 infantry, 85 cornets of horse, and 70 pieces of cannon, ordered public prayers to be offered up at the head of every regiment, and after an appearance of reflection for some hours, made a midnight march, and invested Griffenhagen by break of day; notwithstanding Schomberg lay encamped at Gartz in such a manner, that the two armies were only separated by the river Oder.

The town of Griffenhagen, whose situation is naturally strong, stands on the north-east bank of the river, about twelve miles distant from Stetin. By means of its bridge it is also a pass of great importance, as it communicates with the Marche on one side, and with Pomerania and Brandenburg on the other ||.

to the opposite town: for that from Griffenhagen abutted two miles above Gartz, and that from Gartz did just the same in regard to Griffenhagen. It sufficed Gustavus to entrench a body of troops on the eastern-foot of Gartz-bridge.

What apparently rendered the siege more difficult, was the neighbourhood of Schomberg's forces ; yet his majesty had received private assurances, that the Imperial general, merely through the distress and poverty of his troops (for they durst not plunder and commit outrages in the manner they had done before the Swedes arrived*) had dispersed a part of them into better quarters at some distance from the main army. It was true he had the power of throwing as many men into the town before it was invested, as he thought fit : but Gustavus was not to be deterred by an effort of this sort, concluding thereby only to obtain a greater number of prisoners ; since he took his measures so prudently, after having once invested the town, that Schomberg should not pass its bridges without permission, it being in his own power to blow them up whenever he pleased. Nevertheless, he mixed consideration and humanity with the ideas of precaution and safety, and looked upon destroying the bridges as ruining the intercourse between two very considerable places, losing the affections of the natives, and cramping his own locomotions to the east and to the west, in case he became successful. For these reasons he moored his ships at proper distances along the sides of the two bridges, with directions to fire from fixed batteries upon any extraordinary occasion.

His majesty soon examined the situation of the ground round the town, and having made choice of a convenient hill, thundered upon the city-walls day and night from the mouths of sixty pieces of large battering cannon with such inexpressible fury, that he made an opening, which in all appearances rendered the place assailable. Nevertheless, to be more secure, and not sacrifice the lives of his men out of pure gallantry, he sent for Wildefein, a Swiss lieutenant-colonel in his own regiment of guards, giving him orders to cloath himself in armour, and take an exact survey of the breach : but as that officer brought back an unfavourable account, the fire was renewed a few hours more ; and then two entrances were made by a couple of batteries, which mounted 20 pieces of cannon on each side of a tower, capable to admit two or three men abreast. Wildefein led on the first musqueteers, and his colonel, the

1630. gallant baron Teüffel, seconded him with a body of pike-men. Struck with such astonishing resolution, the Imperialists began by little and little to give ground, and fly out of the town by way of the Oder-bridge. On that side Sir Alexander Lesly lay encamped, who attempted to clear the passage by such ordnance, as had been planted in the king's ships for that purpose: but before this could be effected to any considerable degree, great part of the garrison, which consisted of 2,500 men, had got over, and drew up in battle array on the other side of the river, where the king's troops could not approach them. Lesly then made himself master of an outwork, and getting between that and the town-wall, near the place where the assailants had entered, an unlucky mistake happened between his party and theirs, from consequences natural enough in such great confusion; for they fired reciprocally on each other with incredible fury. The brave Wildestein and Sir Thomas Conway *, an Englishman, were both wounded; nor might the mischief have stopped there, had not a Swede, who received a mortal stroke from a musquet-ball, made some ejaculations to heaven in his own language, and thus the misapprehension was discovered. Both parties then joined and soon cleared the town: for the governor Ferdinando di Capua, a Neapolitan, and knight of the order of St. James de Compostella, could keep only 5 or 600 soldiers about him: nevertheless, he fought it out to the last man, and died soon afterwards of the wound he received in his thigh; being conveyed at his own request to Stetin, which place, some weeks before, he had vain-gloriously boasted to render himself master of with little or no difficulty. This brave man was much dismayed at one event; he had been overpersuaded, during the siege, to send his colours for safety's sake to Schomberg's camp, and from that moment, upon fresh and fresh recollection, began to despair of the success of his resistance. This slight circumstance also, conformably to the superstitious ideas of that age, terrified and puzzled the common men to such a degree, that they soon left their commander in that disorder, which we have above described. Signior Antonio, serjeant-major to the governor, was taken prisoner, and some few of the better fort ; whom the king, on account of their ransoms, made a present of to baron Teüffel. Amongst other persons, who persevered in this extraordinary resistance, was a count La Torre, a youth of a most liberal countenance, in the fifteenth year of his age. His majesty had an eye immediately to this young warrior, and after giving orders to protect him from the undiscerning fury of the soldiers, commanded him to be new cloathed, conformably to his quality and merit, with permission to wear his sword, scarf, and plumage.

* Sir Thomas commanded a regiment of the coast of Denmark; and Sir John Cassels succeeded him, who was also an Englishman. Some time afterwards he had the misfortune to lose his life in a ship-wreck on

The Imperialists had deputed an handful of men to set the town on fire in various places, but the flames were soon extinguished by the vigilance of the Swedes. As the town was taken by assault, the soldiers were allowed free plunder for the space of four hours ; but no outrages were committed.

Immediately after Christmas-day, his majesty marched his whole army in high spirits towards Gartz, crossing the river Oder at both bridges in hopes to allure Schomberg, who had more troops than himself, to a decisive engagement ; but that general retired immediately, and dispatched a messenger to Tilly with an account of the ill state of his troops. In the king's way stood a very important fort in a morass, called Capua's sconce ; but the real name of it was fort Morvitz. It was new, and fortified upon the best principles then known ; but the garrison (which was a very great oversight) hardly made any resistance. A lesser fort was taken by the king immediately afterwards. But at supper time it was reported in the royal tent, that the town of Gartz was all in flames ; and on this his majesty starting up from table, beheld the lights, and heard great explosions in the air. Schomberg was employing himself at that moment in the act of decamping, and blew up some old turrets where the powder was lodged ; in which he was considered by many as acquitting himself in an unfoldier-like manner, as also in not defending fort Capua, and relinquishing a pass so important as Gartz was esteemed to be. But the king's intrepidity, good discipline, and unwearied perseverance, had created a

1630. fort of alarm in Schomberg's mind : he pretended too, that his troops were ill paid ; that they were too libertine and dissolute, and too much accustomed to cruelty and plunder. Be that as it will, he, having first drawn off his garrison, sunk his cannon in the river, destroyed all the ammunition he could not remove, burnt the bridge after him, (an act highly unpopular to the country) and made a long retreat, which appeared rather too precipitate for a good commander, inasmuch as it threw his soldiers into some distrust. What this general proposed to himself was, to lodge his troops in Francfort upon the Oder, and take upon him the defence of that city, not under the appearance of a garrison, but in the light of an army capable of giving the enemy some notable opposition. Supposing the idea to be right or wrong, Schomberg was not happy in the execution thereof ; for four of his regiments in their march were overtaken and handled severely enough ; 300 baggage waggons were lost, and colonel Spar escaped with difficulty : and if during the latter part of Schomberg's retreat the town of Custrin * had not opened its gates to him (Spar being detached on that occasion) he had missed securing that important passage, and lost, in all probability, the greatest part of his army †. On the other hand, Francfort and Landsberg had fallen of course into the possession of the Swedes ; and the fatal storming of Magdeburg, which happened the May ensuing, had been prevented. But for the present, the unhappy timidity of the elector of Brandenburg counter-worked, as much as possible, that great and astonishing plan of conquest, which Gustavus had formed.

For it must be observed, that when his troops arrived at Custrin in pursuit of the flying Imperialists, the garrison closed the city-gates

* This town, situated about fourteen miles from Francfort, was then, and is since, considered as one of the most important passes in the empire ; being placed in the middle of a great morass, at the confluence of the Warta and Oder. The fortress is accessible only by one cause-way, which is five miles long ; and in approaching it you cross no less than thirty-two bridges. Most of its proprietors, the electors of Brandenburg, have made improvements to its fortifications, so that it is deemed upon the whole impregnable : be that as it will, thus much is certain, it hath never yet been taken by open force.

against him, which deprived him of the means of ruining Schomberg's army, and marching directly to Tilly with a view to give him battle. Nevertheless, a disappointment of this kind only sharpened the king's industry, instead of dismaying him. 1630.

And here, by a sort of co-incidence with the conclusion of December, close likewise the military operations of the year 1630; during the space of which died John count of Anholt, second in authority to Tilly, and Rambold count Colalto, who had been commander in chief in the Mantuan war; as also Melchior, cardinal Klefel, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, who had been prime minister and favourite to the emperors Rodolphus and Mathias, but was imprisoned by Ferdinand, and banished before that prince ascended the throne; of which transaction we have spoken largely in another place, as likewise of his poverty, and his disculpation by the see of Rome. He was recalled some years before his death, but never chose (if we make only one exception) to immerse himself again in politics; for it is thought by many, that when Walslein was tottering in his power, he gave him clandestinely that direction of obliquity, which brought him to the ground.

By way of a finishing paragraph at the conclusion of this year, I shall only observe, that Charles I, by the interposition and persuasion of the court of Spain, sent Sir Henry Vane to the electress Palatin, with orders to lay before her, in the most persuasive manner, the expediency of allowing her eldest son to be educated a papist at the court of Vienna, with a view to make a match between him and one of the princesses of the house of Austria; to which representation she replied heroically, "That rather than comply with so irreligious and mean a proposal, she would be her son's executioner with her own hands."

The year 1631 opened with the common severity of a German winter; but Gustavus kept the war alive with all due briskness and fervour. The very night Griffenhagen was taken, he, for some reasons, slept with his army in the open field, and next morning cast his eyes upon Landsberg, a strong town situated on the river Warta. It was an object worth possessing, both as a place of importance, and 1631. as it was full of provisions, ammunition, and artillery. But the attempt, upon a closer review, appeared discouraging; for the garrison had been greatly augmented by many fugitives from Gartz: so Horn, who had been sent upon the errand of besieging it, was commanded back, and orders were given to blockade it with several regiments of foot and horse.

The court of Vienna began now to consider Gustavus as something more than a king of snow, (such being the denomination, which the Austrian ministry at first gave him;) for he continued to gain ground every hour, and had amassed together an army, which appeared to be formidable even in respect of numbers, having improved it in the space of six months on his own strength, from a slight beginning of 13,000 men, to 34,400 infantry, and 11,800 cavalry, without comprehending the British and German troops, that acted under Oxenstiern in Prussia, the forces that Banier commanded in the reduction of Mecklenberg and about Magdeburg, and the eight regiments, that were employed in the blockade of Colbergen. He had likewise in Sweden a body of reserve, amounting to 25,000 effective soldiers; so that upon the whole, he was esteemed capable at this period, in case any occasion of emergency should present itself, of leading into the field a well instructed and well appointed army, amounting to 71,200 combatants; having at the same time issued out commissions to raise 10,600 fresh men*.

Astonished to behold a prince creating to himself such inconceivable resources, and approaching more and more to the southward every hour, the house of Austria, which saw no visible marks of Gustavus's dissolution, but considered him rather as an inventive and persevering warrior, began now sincerely to repent, that she had ever inclined an ear to the representations of the catholic princes at Ratibon, which at that time were esteemed meer memoir-work and matter of form. It is true, she struggled long and hard against the swallowing this bitter prescription, that was recommended to her: but as the cry, either at, or just before the arrival of Gustavus, was so very loud and persevering, with reference to the enormous expences of maintaining a number of superfluous and dissolute soldiers, it was resolved to disband a certain part of the army; and, what was yet more unfortunate, the young and vigorous troops were retained, and many of the old weather-beaten Walloons were dismissed, upon supposition they had passed the flower of their age and service; though perhaps one fourth of these men were fit to be officers, and many capable of supporting the character of generals. By this single error (which no historian hath taken notice of, as to its consequences) the house of Austria ruined herself. For these experienced veterans, who had been born in camps, and nursed in war, knew nothing either of manufactures or of agriculture; and having a turn, as well as ambition, to live by the sword, conveyed themselves, by little and little, into the service of Gustavus and his allies.

Though, for some particular reasons, I bestow a few retouches here upon this extraordinary transaction, with a view to introduce the regulations of discipline made about this time in consequence thereof, and to delineate in proper colours the embarrassment into which it naturally threw the court of Vienna; yet the reader will be pleased to recollect, that the step had been taken some months before, when Gustavus first engaged himself in the German invasion, and when it was the fashionable tone of raillery in the court-circle at Vienna to consider him as a sort of enthusiastical adventurer, who with an handful of new-raised troops, that had fought only against Muscovites, Poles, and Cossacks, had formed a chimerical hope of defeating and destroying an inconceivable number of regular troops, who, to say the least of them, had been flushed with success, and improved by the experience of twelve successive campaigns, all crowned with an uninterrupted victory.

The fatality of this disbanding scheme was soon found out, but the men were vanished. However, by way of succedaneum, the Imperial regulations in matters military were made public*: the doctrine of levying contributions was proposed to be rendered more reasonable and equitable, and assurances of pay set forth to the soldiers upon a better footing of probability; and as peace by this time was concluded in Italy, Aldringer and Galas had orders to march that army into Germany, 1631. which had performed such great service at the siege of Mantua. The emperor then exhorted the electors and catholic princes to exert themselves to the utmost at this extraordinary crisis of danger, "which in truth, said he, ought to annihilate all personal interests, as well as private animosities." But what went most against his inclination was, to rebate the edge and rigour of the edict of restitution; and yet the supposed convention of protestant princes, then talked of to be assembled at Leipzig, rendered something necessary either to be done or promised on that head. Some moderate catholics sincerely wished to make a few concessions in good earnest; for they saw a tempest gathering, which portended more than an equivalent for certain casual acquisitions: but the majority of the Austrian and Spanish faction was dazzled with the glittering hopes of universal monarchy, and the unbounded prospect of confiscation and plunder. Some were delighted with the total subversion of heresy; numbers confided in the fortune and experience of the Imperial troops, and feared their enemies the less, as their army was a confused collection of twenty different nations.

If we except the difficulties, which Gustavus found at this time in the hope of besieging Landsberg successfully, it may be worth observing, that in the short space of eight days, during the very depth of winter, he had cleared all Pomerania and the Marche from the Warta to the Oder, and opened to himself a communication with Brandenburg, Silesia, and Lusatia. By these means he gave the inhabitants of Pomerania a breathing-time to renew their commerce and agriculture, and draw from them reciprocally very considerable supplies for the support of his army.

Leaving Horn therefore with the gross of his army about Landsberg, he shaped his course towards Stetin, and made himself master of New-Brandenburg, where colonel Marazini commanded with 1600 men, part of whom was his own regiment, which proved so fatal afterwards to the king at the battle of Lutzen. Pleased with this latter enterprise, he next took Clemptno, Trepto, and Loitch, the town itself being of no consequence, but the fortress extremely strong. At this last place a ridiculous circumstance fell out, which gave the king both mirth and wonder. One Pietro Perazzi, an Italian *, commanded the castle. A trumpeter was sent to him with an exhortation to surrender; upon which Perazzi fell into a violent passion, called for his servants to help him on with his armour, sent for the ladies to behold him in his military garniture, ordered the trumpets to sound a charge, and returned word back to the king; That he was a man of honour, and would maintain the depositum committed to his charge at his enemy's peril, and for his master's glory, to the last moments of his life; since his purpose was to make a quite different figure from what the commandants had done at Clempno and Trepto. During the time the trumpeter delivered his message, the fair females hung round this blood-thirsty determined combatant, and besought him not to push matters to the very violence of extremity. In an instant he uncloathed himself from his armour, and sent word he was ready to capitulate. Gustavus was astonished at a man of so unaccountable a character, and admitted the surrender upon one proviso, that Perazzi might be present at the signing of the articles; for he privately longed to see him. But greater was his astonishment, when Perazzi produced himself, gay, alert, and unembarrassed, dressed as gorgeously as a bridegroom, in embroidered cloaths, with a massy gold chain hung thwart-wise across his breast. A gentleman of fashion belonging to Gustavus's life-guard had no patience to see such a hero, and without preface, or any other previous ceremony (being supposed to conclude instantaneously how far he might presume to venture on such a freedom in the royal presence) took the chain composedly off his neck. His majesty gave some secret mark of approbation, and Perazzi, not in the least disconcerted, made a low bow with a smile, and talked of something else. And thus this intercourse ended; for the king was so divided betwixt the ridiculous and the incomprehensible, that he knew not what to do, or say; infomuch that it was a matter of question amongst his officers, whether the bravest person in Europe would have

* Chemnitius calls him Peralta, and supposes him to be a Spaniard: but other very valuable historians pronounce him an Italian; and indeed the character is more consistent with that nation.

1631. puzzled him so profoundly. Nevertheless, this redoubtable Perazzi had passed among the Imperial troops for a true Italian Spetza-ferro. Which recalls to my mind an half-countryman of his, one Pietro Ferrari, a Corsican, a blufferer and barbarian of a very strange and unaccountable character*, who being asked, why he threw a commander of great distinction, whom he had taken prisoner, into a dark dungeon, which he did in order to extort a ransom the sooner, feeding him only with bread and water, and appointing two wretched followers of the camp to attend him, one loathsome with his wounds, and one infected by the plague; made this prompt and astonishing answer to his remonstrating friends: Gentlemen, what shall I alledge? My father is dead, and I have consoled myself—My mother is dead, and I have consoled myself—And if this rascal, this becco cornuto, (I am here repeating his own words) should die of want and a broken heart, I shall console myself likewise.—

Nevertheless, thus much must be observed by the way, that we nowhere hear of the Ferrari's and the Perazzi's in the field of battle.

By this time the month of January was half advanced, and the king, who was alike industrious in the cabinet and in the field, had contrived to negotiate a treaty with the archbishop of Bremen, with George duke of Luneberg, and William landgrave of Hesse-Cassel.

What next came upon the carpet were the articles of alliance between France and Sweden, the whole of the negotiation being left to the management of De Charnacé on the one part, and the generals Horn and Banier on the other. This affair was transacted at the camp of Berewalt, in the marquisate of Brandenburg, having been projected in Sweden the preceding year †. The French ambassador still insisted upon one part of his old nonsense, about refusing the king his regal titles; but Gustavus gave him peremptorily to understand, that if he brought nothing in his packet but such futilities, he was master of the day and hour of returning to France without further ceremony.

† Arnilabei Arma Suecica, p. 100. This appears likewise from the 10th article of the treaty.

An English ambassador likewise made his appearance before Gustavus, and presented letters in behalf of his master, explaining, in a long series of deductions, the motives, that induced him to demand the restitution of the Palatinates : but the proposals he made were so chimerical (the supplies of men and money being likewise forgotten) that Gustavus gave him leave to retire without exhibiting his papers to public view, giving him his promise of honour to take the affair into his own hands, and act therein as to himself appeared best, or, in other words, as matters appeared, upon the concurrence of future events, to be most reasonable and most convenient.

The tenor of the confederation between Sweden and France ran to this effect ; that it was to continue in force for five years next ensuing, being to be ratified without delay by the two respective kings. Its principal articles were as follow* : “ That his majesty of Sweden should maintain “ an army on foot consisting of 30,000 infantry and 6000 cavalry ; and “ that the French king should furnish him annually with 400,000 “ crowns, payable at Paris and Amsterdam in two separate payments, “ at the choice of the king of Sweden.—The object of this armament
 “ was to be the liberty of Germany, the re-establishment of oppressed “ princes and states, the demolition of new forts and harbours on the “ coast of the Baltic, with an eye likewise to what had happened in the “ Valteline and the country of the Grisons : that a free reciprocal com“ merce should be established between the subjects of France and Swe“ den : that the catholic religion (in support of which article Richelieu “ laboured extremely, with a view to render himself popular at home) “ should continue sub eadem forma in those places where it had been an-“ tiently professed ; and that a good understanding should be cultivated “ with the elector of Bavaria (at whose court some private intrigues “ were then fostering to the detriment of Sweden) “ and the princes of “ the league, in case they were inclined either to friendship or neutra“ lity : that such princes, as were desirous to accede to the said confe“ deration, should be admitted upon the same conditions : and, lastly,

“ that

This convention was fully assented to January 13, 1631, yet the ratifications were not exchanged in due form till the May following. The whole cast and form of this treaty hath been considered as a masterpiece in the political science; nor must it be here forgotten, that England and Holland, some few weeks afterwards, acceded thereto †.

During the discussions, which naturally attended this treaty, his majesty took the field by day, and maintained his argument with De Charnacé in the evening; during which interval, or rather a few days before, Lesly had rendered himself master of the castle of Lignitz, which the king made him a present of by way of country villa; and Bauditzen, by dint of a general storm, took Piritz (which in the Vandal language signifies abundance of corn) a town of considerable importance, situated on the frontiers of Outer-Pomerania, garrisoned at that time by 1400 Imperialists.

Mean while Melk, a native of Mechlenberg, who from a simple soldier rose to be a partizan of repute, being a person often made use of upon hazardous occasions, performed an uncommon exploit upon Malchin, a strong fort situated upon the banks of the Pene, and defended by two companies of dragoons. His little army consisted only of 300 foot and 36 cavaliers; but having invited a good number of peasants into the service, and giving each of them two lighted matches in their hands, dispersing them at the same time here and there in small parties, and especially along the grand avenue over a morass, that approached the town, he summoned the garrison about four in the morning to capitulate in the name of the king and all his forces, protesting at the same time, that if they hesitated a single moment, no quarter should be allowed them. The commandant complied on so unforeseen an exigency, not permitting himself to examine into Melk's assertions; and thus he, and his two companies, were made prisoners of war; who, with the same facility they surrendered the town, enrolled themselves into the Swedish service, not caring to rejoin their antient companions, nor undergo a series of severe and sharp military farcafms. Nor must another flight example of this leffer kind of war be here omitted; and the rather, as Gustavus considered it as the very grammar of the art military, and the only sure and expeditious method of obtaining the knowledge of men's abilities. One Braun, an ensign in young Thurn's regiment of musqueteers (which regiment at that time carried wheel fire-locks, and not match-locks) taking with him just fifteen determined companions, crossed the Oder in a small boat, and gave a camifado on the quarters of 200 Croatian horse, with a colonel at their head. Entering the village unobserved, he marched directly to the grand guard, and, missing the commander in chief, shot the ensign of the regiment dead with his own hand. His few men soon made terrible havock, and by the suddenness and terror of the onset put the Imperialists to a precipitate flight, who knew neither the number nor strength of their assailants. Braun presented the colours (on which was portrayed a fable bipartite eagle in a silver field) to the king his master at Berewalt, and received from the royal hand a very magnificent gold chain, and a commission to take upon him the command of captain in his own regiment; the stipend of captain in the Swedish service being at that time a small matter more than double the pay of an ensign*.

The extraordinary advances of Gustavus, (who paid no regard to one of the severest winters, as by this time it proved, that Germany had felt for many years, but on the contrary derived even advantages from the frost, by transporting his artillery over deep morasses otherwise impassible, as happened particularly in the siege of Damin, which we are going to relate,) gave some faint glimmerings of hope to the protestant electors and princes, whom the terrors of the house of Austria had almost frozen into a state of inactivity, and emboldened them to venture on an assembly, which was actually opened at Leipzig the eighth of February.

Whilst these cautious and fluctuating politicians employed themselves in the operations of the cabinet, his majesty being joined by Kniphau-

* Chemnitius, Tom. i. lib. ii. p. 95.

1631. fen, with a body of 2000 foot and 1000 cavalry, invested Damin, a place of great importance on the banks of the Pene, situated between the duchies of Mechlenburg and Pomerania, and belonging at present to the king of Prussia. It was the key of admission to the first named duchy ; and had been destined likewise to be the grand Imperial magazine on the coasts of the Baltic *. This town had been fortified by the Imperialists at a great expence ; but the castle, which was seated in a deep morafs, most men considered as inexpugnable ; yet the Swedes found means to approach it by the assistance of the frost. No less person was governor than the duke of Savelli, and the garrison consisted of 1700 veteran troops, selected from his own regiment, and that of Holk. He had likewise provisions and military stores in great abundance, not to mention a new supply of artillery, which he had received from Gripswald ; infomuch that Tilly, who then lay near Francfort upon the Oder, and purposed to raise the siege of Damin, concluded the town, in his own judgment, capable of making a resistance of twenty days. But the king (not that we have need to blame Tilly's opinion) was a warrior, who chose very compendious methods of proceeding ; though, to speak the truth, part of his success was justly owing to the frozen condition of the ground.

The Swedes arrived, invested the town, and besieged it in form in one day. Upon the good or evil turn of this siege depended more than half the success of Tilly's future operations : for as it was that general's object to make a powerful diversion about Magdeburg, and recal the enemy from advancing southward (since otherwise the northern powers would naturally withdraw their allegiance from the emperor, having the Swedish army between them and Vienna) he chose, at the time of making this irruption, to maintain a secure retreat into Pomerania, Brandenburg, and Saxony, with a view not only to check the progresses of Gustavus, but to keep the princes of the last named countries under due subjection. And here it must be observed, that the road of his retreat lay directly through Damin.

His majesty thundered against the town from his batteries all the first afternoon and night on the side next the river, where he placed himself : and Teüffel next morning made a lodgment in an half-moon, and repulsed the enemy in a general sally, which Savelli ordered. Mean while Kniphaufen played with equal fury upon the castle, having full room to spread himself round it, as the frost supplied the place of bridges, which the Imperialists had broken down. By break of day, a lieutenant, at the head of 400 chosen musqueteers, began the storm ; and being vigorously assisted by his associates, fixed himself in a part of the fortification : upon which the garrison secured the remainder by cutting off all connexion, and retired principally to an old tower, whose walls were so thick, that it seemed impossible to apply cannon against them. The king surveyed this antique structure with great attention, and gave immediate orders to undermine it, in spite of all the severity of the weather : and when some progress had been made in that work, the commandant thought proper to surrender with seven companies of Holk's infantry, who, as their colours could not be excepted, consented to enroll themselves into the Swedish service.

It may be asked, why this garrison did not retire into the city, where Savelli greatly wanted such a re-inforcement ? To resolve this question, it must be observed, that the castle, situated in a deep morass, was removed from the city about 1000 paces, and had no communication with it but by means of a causeway, in the middle of which a strong fortification was erected. His majesty soon discovered the importance of such a post, and ordered Teüffel's lieutenant-colonel, on the very afternoon of his arrival, to make himself master of it sword in hand. The service was extremely obstinate on both sides ; and one Heatly, an English officer, gained good applause : for though he received on the first onset a very dangerous musquet-shot, he still continued to press on, and entered the fortrefs before the rest of his comrades ; nor could any persuasion induce him to retire till the Imperialists were cleared to a single man*.

Nor must I forget here what happened to a Scottish officer, one Robert Ross, who the first day of the siege, in the midst of an unmer-

His majesty having rendered himself master of the castle, took care to display Holk's crimson ensigns on one of his batteries, and then possessed himself of two important outworks ; upon which the besieged made a second desperate sally, but Banier repulsed them with considerable loss, conducting the whole engagement with so much valour and presence of mind, that the king, who stood at a distance, and rarely cared to act the part of a spectator, passed the whole time in contemplating his conduct, and bestowing upon it all possible encomiums. A part of Monro's regiment, commanded by major Potley, an English cavalier, performed a gallant action in this rencounter ; for a soldier of Banier's being in danger of remaining on the field mortally wounded, (his countrymen refusing the desperate service of bringing him off) the Scots formed themselves by consent into one body, and restored him to his comrades. The poor man died that night in great agitations and emotion, admiring the generosity of strangers, and bestowing many bitter reflections on his national companions.

A circumstance not so unpleasant happened to fall out in this self-same rencounter ; for as the British troops were marching down a steep hill, exposed to a furious cannonading of the enemy, one Lisle, an ensign, happened to tumble forwards, and the wind being extremely high carried away his peruke ; upon which Potley swore a great oath, that an unfortunate cannon-ball had taken off the cavalier's head. The king enjoyed this ridiculous scene at a slight distance. Nor did his majesty about the same time escape from a certain adventure without difficulty* : for having an inclination to survey in person the enemies works, by the assistance of a perspective glass, the ice of a sudden gave way, and down he sunk to the arm-pits. One captain Dumaine, who lay at the most advanced guard, ran immediately to his assistance ; but the king with extraordinary compofure of mind, made a fignal to him with his hand to retire to his poft. In fpite of this precaution near 1000 mufquet-fhots, at a confiderable diftance it is true, were difcharged againft his majefty, who at length, with uncommon patience, wrought himfelf free from his incumbrances, and making the beft of his way to the guard-fire, called for cold meat and a goblet of Baccharah wine, and, having afterwards changed his cloaths, intermixed with his troops, who were employed in repulfing the befieged in a fally.

Dumaine, who was a gentleman of fpirit and good manners, took the liberty to remonstrate with his mafter upon this adventure, representing to him, that the well-being of Europe depended upon the fafety of his fingle perfon. The king heard him with great complacency; But, captain, faid he, I have a foolifh fort of a fancy, which tempts me to imagine, that nothing can be better feen than when I obferve it myfelf.

On the fourth morning after the fiege major Greenland, an Englifh officer in the Imperial fervice, waited upon the king from the duke de Savelli, and Guftavus fhewed fome indulgence to his propofals, as the governor's defence had not proved over-obftinate: neverthelefs it was ftipulated, that Savelli and his officers fhould give their promife in writing, not to ferve againft Sweden or its allies for the fpace of three months. Conditions, in other refpects honourable, were foon granted. The Swedifh army felt a particular joy upon this capitulation; for Quinti Aligheri (whom Chemnitius calls Quinti del Ponte) the traytor, that attempted to deftroy the king in an ambufcade, had been admitted lieutenant-colonel in the regiment of Savelli, and was well known to be in the city, when it was firft invested. By what methods he contrived to efcape hath never appeared; all we know is, that he was killed the May enfuing in ftorming the town of Magdeburg. Neverthelefs on the furrender of Damin, the generals in a body represented to the king, that the wealth of the affaffin ought to be confifcated to his majefty's ufes, (for, as we obferved before, Aligheri was partly excited to deftroy Guftavus, in order to fave the rich harveft of ten years plunder refofited by him in this city:) but the anfwer was, That all tranfactions in matter of capitulation implied f acred and punctual obfervance; and a the exception had

His majesty, it is said, received a slight wound during the present siege, and lost about 300 very excellent soldiers. Letters were intercepted from Tilly to the governor, wherein he besought him to hold out only four days longer, and promised him certain assistance. Be that as it will, the Imperial general lodged a process against him before the council of war at Vienna, and brought his life in question: but Savelli made it appear he had private orders not to sacrifice such a chosen handful of troops: and the emperor by way of justification dispatched him on an honourable embassy to Italy, and employed him afterwards in military services: nevertheless he was to the last either injudicious in war, or unfortunate.

When Savelli quitted the town at the head of his garrison with ensigns flying, and attended by all his baggage-waggons, and two pieces of cannon, Gustavus received him on horse-back, and having first made a courteous speech to the magistrates, turned round, and desired him to present his compliments to the emperor, with assurances, that he waged war against him merely for the sake of civil and religious liberty, since he bore no personal resentments against him. He then told the duke, That he considered him as a man intended by nature to shine rather at courts than in the field of battle †. At first sight one is apt to consider such a sort of speech as something tending to abruptness and indelicacy: nevertheless his majesty's manner of addressing this commander may be justified to a certain point. Duke Savelli's courage, it is true, was never called in question, either before or after this period; and some suppose, that Gustavus was not only unapprized of his private instructions, but piqued likewise at discovering, that even an enemy had not made a more obstinate defence. But the king was too good a politician to reproach the Imperialists for surrendering their towns to him upon over-easy terms. The probable occasion of this asperity was as follows.

Duke Savelli, as I have seen by a painting and some prints of him, was almost the only general in those wars (don Baltazar di Marradas excepted) who wore a large perriwig of that fashion, which was afterwards called Chedreux * amongst us in the beginning of the reign of Charles II. Now Gustavus thought this habiliment of the head rather too fantastick for a great commander; and therefore, not without some little indignation, pronounced him a better courtier than a warrior.

Nor was Savelli's character becoming a nobleman of his rank. No person was more fordidly avaricious and extorting, though to outward appearance the fine gentleman of that age. Once having received a quantity of horses from the gentry and farmers of the district round him, by way of levying contributions, (wherein the generals of those days were extremely sharp and dexterous) and finding them by reason of their leanness and ill-plight, neither purchaseable nor redeemable, he ordered the hangman of his regiment to flea them, and put the money the hides sold for into his pocket †. In a word, he was always considered as one of the inquisitors of the duchy of Mechlenberg, and was also so odd a mixture of bigotry, as well as cruelty, that he would allow no child in his district of command to receive the rites of baptism from the hands of a Lutheran minister. Upon leaving the town, he was obliged to consign to the king abundance of provisions and military-stores, together with sixty very fine pieces of brass ordnance: and as Tilly was expected to march that way, and a stress of action supposed to be coming on, his majesty made no less person than Banier commander of Damin, and prepared himself in every shape for the great event of fighting Tilly. With wonderful precaution therefore and dexterity, he fixed Kniphausen with his own regiment, and six companies of English and Scots, at New-Brandenburg, placed major Sinclair with a small body of infantry at Trepto ‡, lodged the royal regiment of horse, and Monro's detachment of foot at Malchin, recalled Gustavus Horn from the blockade of Landsberg, with injunctions to encamp at Fridland, (each officer having express 1631. orders in writing, without any discretionary powers of departing from them) and lastly, reposed himself for a few days with the main army at Passewald, a strong pass, which commanded the road between Pomerania and Mecklenberg.

Thus the king, in eight months time (which to many readers will appear incredible, considering what a force the Imperialists had the power to produce against him) had rendered himself master of four-score cities, forts, and castles, and cleared the whole passage behind him even to the Baltic ocean; being a district of near 140 miles in breadth, not to mention the command of all the rivers and important passes. And these conquests may be considered as absolutely entire, if we except Colbergen, which surrendered at this juncture, and the town of Gripswald, which Banier had first blockaded, and then Todt; nevertheless, it held out till the middle of summer.

Colbergen had resisted a blockade formed by Horn and other Swedish generals, for the space of five months: at length provisions growing scarce, and all hopes of relief vanished, colonel St. Julian *, the governor, an old officer of repute at the battle of Prague, thought fit to surrender upon terms of honour, and preserved a garrison of about 1500 men, (of which one third were dragoons) whom the Swedes agreed to escort to Landsberg. They were stopped at Friedburg in the New March, by way of reprisal for Tilly's cruelty to the garrisons of New-Brandenburg and Feldberg; but it does not appear, that any man was put to death; they were only disarmed. Colbergen, next to Stralsund, was esteemed a town of the most considerable consequence of any in the whole dukedom of Pomerania. It was also strongly fortified, according to the practice of those times, and was one of the keys of the Baltic ocean, which made Gustavus excessively desirous to render himself master of it. And indeed Bauditzen obtained it at a most critical time; for three days afterwards four ships well supplied with soldiers, and deeply laden with provisions, touched at Colbergen,

(a circumstance of assistance, which might have preserved the town, had it arrived in proper time and succeeded); but the Imperial sea-officers perceiving the town to be otherwise disposed of, suddenly changed their course, and returned to the ocean. Yet his majesty had taken all proper preventive measures against an expedition of this nature; for vice-admiral Ulfpar lay in the harbour with two ships of force, being protected on each side by a new-raised mole, which was flanked with batteries and extemporary fortifications, erected by the care of colonel Boëtius. This officer, by his master's orders, was particularly cautious in the form of wording the capitulation, and carried his point in two affairs, that were partly useful, and partly matter of punctilio: the one related to the preservation of all the Pomeranian archives, ecclesiastical and civil; and the other turned upon the restitution of a pair of colours, that belonged to a Swedish regiment of cavalry, and which Gustavus could not bear to see in the enemy's possession: so jealous was he of the slightest disgrace! Four hundred soldiers of the Imperial garrison took the oaths of allegiance and discipline to the crown of Sweden, having the liberty to follow the fate of their colours, which Horn took care to see surrendered by article.

In the mean while Tilly decamped from Francfort on the Oder, with an army of 20,000 combatants, paid his men (contrary to the Austrian custom) promptly and cheerfully; and advanced to raise the siege of Damin, or give Gustavus battle. But hearing the town had capitulated, he turned short on the castle of Feldsberg, near New-Brandenburg, took it by storm, and after that slaughter, which naturally happens in an obstinate resistance, put 50 of the surviving Swedish soldiers to the sword. He then dispatched camp-master general Cratz with 12,000 men to invest New-Brandenburg, and followed him with the remaining part of the army. The garrison consisted of 2000 selected troops, and serjeant-major general Kniphausen, an approved officer, commanded them, who made an incredible resistance. He was a chieftain of slow but excellent parts, and considered as the best general, under whom a young man could form himself. It was his maxim to leave little or nothing to the hazard of fortune; and when other

1631. men were prosperous in a manner, that seemed to him not quite scientific, he used to say with emotion, That a dram of good luck enabled a commander sooner to reach his object, than an ounce of good sense. He had an incurable aversion to the Scottish nation, which created him some enemies. It is true, the king had ordered him to retire and save his men; but the messenger and the letter happened to fall unfortunately into Tilly's hands. Of course Knipphausen, though destitute of artillery, acquitted himself like a man of service, concluding from the king's silence, that he should certainly be relieved: and hence it was, that he refused honourable conditions, when the Imperial general proposed them. The town was battered several days in a manner as furious, as had been observed during the preceding course of the war; yet the breach was not assaultable upon prudential views, and the rampart-wall was too high for scaling-ladders to be fixed against it with any hopes of success. Nevertheless, chance and temerity brought about a strange event; for as Tilly on the eighth day of the siege was riding round his lines, and making some necessary remarks, the soldiers rushed into the breach by dint of surprize, maintained their ground, and poured into the town, being supported by all the infantry of the army, who crowded to the walls without orders. The young count of Montecuculi*, being now in the twenty-third year of his age, and having served from sixteen in the capacity of a common foot-soldier, was the first man, who mounted the walls, and presented one of the keys of the city-gates to his general. Knipphausen, with his

* Raymond, count de Montecuculi. His ardour in the first battle of Leipzig carried him in so far among the Swedes, that he was taken prisoner: and it is a certain fact, though few historians know it, (he being then only a colonel of horse) that he had a principal hand (serving then under Merci and John de Wert) in defeating Turenne at the battle of Mergentheim, or Mariendal, as the French historians are pleased to call it. His abilities and penetration at that time were so very great, that it was a common saying with the Swedish and French generals, that Montecuculi entertained a familiar spirit in his service, who made him acquainted with all their designs. From this period his history is tolerably well known; his campaign against Turenne being in itself an abridgment of all that is refined and exquisite in the science of war. His two favourite authors were Euclid and Tacitus. Nevertheless, his Military memoirs no ways answer the idea of what he really practised. The truth is, they were drawn up in his earlier campaigns against the Turks; and it would have been no injustice to this great man's memory, to have omitted their publication.

lady, daughter, and niece, his son, and several gentlewomen of condition, four captains, some lieutenants and ensigns, and sixty common soldiers, threw themselves into the town-house, and obtained quarter. He had not time to destroy his papers, which was looked upon as a matter of ill-fortune, and lost nine colours, which gave his master no small regret, as it was the first considerable accident of that kind, which had befallen him in Germany. Near 2000 Swedes and Germans were put to the sword. Half lord Rea's regiment (which said half consisted of 600 persons) was here massacred, almost to a man. Lieutenant-colonel Lindsey, who commanded this corps in his colonel's absence, was killed on the breach, as were also Moncrief, Keith, and Haydon, all Scots. Such as had the good fortune to survive were promoted immediately by the king's express orders.

It is thought Tilly lost 2000 men in storming the town, which in fact was little more than a large unfortified village*: nor did he shew himself that great commander the public expected to find him, in marching directly to Magdeburg, leaving the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony a sacrifice to the Swedes, and allowing Gustavus free passage to Francfort, and the hereditary dominions. But the truth was, he saw too many superior abilities in his Swedish majesty, and dreaded at that juncture the fatal decision of a general battle.

The king, who had arrived as far as Anclam, in order to relieve his serjeant-major general Knipphausen, was so enraged at this massacre and that of Feldsberg, that he declared he would repay Tilly in his own kind, and teach him to wage war like a person of humanity, and not like a Croatian. But the latter, conformably to what we have observed before, finding it difficult to advance, as a detachment of the Swedish army lay directly in his way, namely, at Schwet, turned obliquely, and made an appearance of directing his course towards Magdeburg, in whose neighbourhood Pappenheim then lay. Upon this

1631. the Swedes soon repossessed New-Brandenburg, and the rather, as the Imperialists had just dismantled the principal parts of the fortification.

A general, who had parts like Gustavus, soon saw the evil effects of the siege of Magdeburg, in case the Imperial general should venture to undertake it, and determined within himself to relieve that city after the reduction of Francfort, in case the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony did not counterwork his generous intentions. Be that as it may, no considerations could deter him from advancing southwards.

Tilly now lay at Rappen, undetermined whether to interrupt the intended siege of Francfort *, or invest the town of Magdeburg. The king, for excellent reasons, had lessened the main body of his forces upon this occasion; one part being detached into Pomerania and the March, in order to hinder the Imperial troops, which lay in great numbers about Landsberg; and in Silesia, from intercepting two little armies, which he expected from Prussia and England; and the other part under the conduct of Gustavus Horn, being stationed at the important pass of Schwet (which commands the crossing of the Oder, and gives an opening either to Stetin or Francfort) with a view to prevent Tilly from attacking him behind. These precautions being thus wisely taken, his majesty, at the head of 18,000 men, shaped his course along the banks of the Oder up to Francfort, carrying with him 200 pieces of cannon, and a bridge of boats, which he had constructed at Stetin, being 180 feet long, and of breadth sufficient for five horsemen to march over it abreast. Schomberg, as we observed before, commanded in Francfort, and had a garrison under him of 9000 horse and foot, all chosen veteran troops: but Tieffenbach, then just declared camp-master general of the Imperial army, conformably to Tilly's express orders, had thrown himself into the town at this conjuncture, namely, on the first day of the month of April; which occasioned no small matter of mirth among the Swedish forces, being, saith a grave historian, veteri Germanorum consuetudine ludibrii plena die *. His first business was to ruin the suburbs, country-houses, mills, vineyards, and orchards round the town, which many considered as a mark of premature fear. 1631.

No troops ever made a finer approach than the Swedes did in investing the town. Gustavus marched his whole body of forces, formed upon several columns, in complete battle-array; for he feared some notable obstructions from a garrison, that might be considered as a fort of army, and bore Tilly likewise in remembrance, who lay behind him. He performed himself upon the occasion the duty of serjeant-major de la battaglia, arranging every officer and band of soldiers in their proper places; and having appointed a body of commanded musqueteers to make the forlorn hope, and placed small peletons of 50 foot soldiers between every squadron of horse, arrived without obstruction under the city-walls, leaving all the cavalry, excepting only the Rhingrave's regiment, well posted behind him at some miles distance, for fear Tilly should approach unexpectedly. In this order he paid his visit to the town the afternoon before Palm-Sunday; and having made all proper dispositions both for a siege and an assault, approached with Teüffel very near the enemy's works, in order to view the town-walls and the Guben-gate. In the midst of their observations, the baron received a musquet-shot in his left-arm; and to shew of how much consequence a great general thinks some individuals upon certain occasions, his majesty perfectly changed countenance, and cried, Alas! now Teüffel is disabled, what shall I do †! Upon this the be-

† Swedish Intelligencer, Vol. i. p. 88. The four first parts of this work, which of themselves make two considerable volumes in quarto, reach down to the death of Gustavus. To these is usually prefixed the Swedish discipline, religious, civil and military, consisting of 90 pages. This book, though drawn up in a quaint and most inelegant style, (for nothing can be meaner than its composition) is a treasure intirely peculiar to our own nation: for great part of the accounts, till the king's decease, were delivered to the author (who, I believe, was a clergyman, see Pref. to the second part) by Hepburn, lord Rea, Masham, Astley, and other English and Scottish officers, who bore command in Germany. But after the unfortunate decision of Lutzen, the performance groweth less valuable; for the first writer desisted from his undertaking at that period; so that the continuation of it in various volumes is chiefly an extract from the Mercurius Gallo Belgicus, the Mercure François, &c. &c. As the several parts came out periodically, it is very-rare to find the whole complete.

1631. sieged made a fally; but major Sinclair, who stood just by the king at the head of a body of commanded musqueteers, soon repulsed them, taking a lieutenant-colonel and a captain prisoners, and making a lodgment afterwards in a church-yard, which lay contiguous to the enemy's out-works.

Next morning divine service was twice celebrated throughout the Swedish army; but the Imperialists, who disturbed themselves very little about religion, took this omission of hostilities for the forerunner of a retreat, and in the coarse military way of drollery, hung out a wild-goose on the ramparts, intimating, that the northern birds of passage ought always to think of evacuating a country. Upon which some Scottish officers remarked pleasantly enough, in the phraseology of their own country, That for their own part they hoped soon to see an Imperial goose well roasted, and well sauced.

The king, who had made neither lines nor approaches, being inclined to allow the enemy small time for recollection, determined to storm the town sword in hand about two in the afternoon, supported by the thunder of twelve huge pieces of cannon, directed against the Guben-gate, several other batteries playing at the same time, in order to create a diversion. And hitherward the soldiers turned all their fury, with a view to form one general attack, though the Guben-gate was principally aimed at, whilst the yellow and blue brigades were commanded to approach on the side of the vineyards next to Custrin (a part lying by in order to repulse the enemy's sallies :) mean while the white brigade was appointed to lodge in the fore-town to support the commanded musqueteers, which lay between them and danger; and Hepburn's brigade (the commanded musqueteers belonging to it being conducted by major Sinclair) was destined to carry on the great intended operation; whilst the Rhingrave's regiment of cavalry protected the train of artillery not in use, and kept the approach of Tilly constantly in their thoughts.

His majesty reserved himself for the main attack at the Guben-gate, leaving the conduct of other divisions to approved commanders. He told his men, with a cheerful countenance, that he only besought their patience a few hours longer, and that then he hoped to give them wine to refresh them, and not common water out of the Oder. 1631.

The officers shewed so much alacrity on the occasion, as to undertake this enterprize without their armour; but Gustavus, who had before mixed in the prelude of the assault with the common soldiers, careless of himself, but uneasy for his commanders, remonstrated to them in the kindest terms, That he, who loves the king his master's service, will not hazard his life out of pure gaiety. If my officers are killed, who shall command my soldiers? Giving them therefore express orders to cloath themselves in armour, the fascines and scaling-ladders being all duly prepared, he called for Hepburn and Lumfdel by name: Now, said he, my valiant Scots, remember your countrymen slain at Old Brandenburg; who both in an instant, by the help of two petards, shivered the gate to pieces; and (as the astonished enemy forgot to let fall the port-cullis on the inside) entered the town unhurt at the head of their respective regiments. Close at their heels general Banier crouded in with a fresh body of musqueteers; and forming themselves as well as the streets could allow them, they cut to pieces one Imperial regiment with very little mercy. Upon which a detachment was dispatched to secure the bridge, but it arrived rather too late. Lumfdel's men alone took 18 colours, and after the engagement was over, his majesty bade him ask what he pleased, and he would give it him.

Mean while major Sinclair, and one Heatly an English lieutenant, passed the walls in the quarter of the vineyards by scalado, and upon entering the town at the head of only 50 musqueteers, were attacked by an equal body of cuirassiers completely armed; but they ranged themselves against the walls of the houses, and gave their enemies such a continued fire, that they forced them to retreat. Nor must the conduct of one Andrew Aner, a Saxon lieutenant, be here forgotten, who crossed the town-ditch, and gave chase to some Imperialists, that guarded it. The king, though naturally short-sighted, had soon eye-sight enough to seize one of those fortunate moments, which, when critically snatched, are equal to days and weeks in military operations. He pointed to his troops to follow Aner. The combat was renewed on either side with

1631. incredible fury; at length the besieged gave ground, and the assailants entered the town with them. The Imperialists beat a parley twice, but the confusion was so great no one could hear it. His majesty gave Aner a handsome gratuity of about 150 l. and as he was a man of such alacrity and expedition, told him, he should remove him from the infantry, and try what exploits he could perform in the capacity of captain of horse.

At length the yellow and blue brigades entered, two bodies of troops highly esteemed in the Swedish army. It was their fortune to attack the quarter, where lieutenant-colonel Walter Butler lay with his Irish regiment, who gave the Imperialists an example of resolution, which might have saved the town, if it had been copied even imperfectly; for he stood his ground at push of pike till he had scarce a soldier left with him; nor did he submit till he was shot through the arm with a musquet-ball, and pierced with an halberd through the thigh. All things being thus secured, his majesty, who made the tour of the several attacks on the outside of the walls, entered the town at the head of the Rhingrave's regiment of horse. Tieffenbach, Schomberg and Montecuculi escaped over the bridge, (which was fortified with a strong redoubt on the opposite shore) and conducted their flying troops to Great Glogaw in Silesia, which was distant from Francfort at least sixty miles; 1700 Imperial soldiers were left dead in the town, almost as many more were never heard of; 50 colours were lost; the colonels Herbenstein, Walstein, Jour, and Heydon were killed; and about sixty officers and seven lieutenant-colonels taken prisoners. Amongst the latter were found likewise general major Spar, a native Swede, and the colonels Morval (some say Waldo) and Butler, [the same who afterwards assassinated Walstein,] and about 700 common soldiers. His majesty took infinite pains to prevent pillage, and exercised his baton amongst his followers without remorse; yet they plundered to the amount of 30,000 l. in spite of all his endeavours; for many valuable goods were lodged in the town on account of the approaching fair; yet no woman's honour was violated, and only one burgher killed, merely through his own imprudence and obstinacy.

The king felt inexpressible uneasiness to see his troops disband in hopes of plunder, (for several ensigns were left alone without a man to guard the colours) and determined within himself thenceforwards to administer some effectual remedy to this notorious violation of military discipline. But the tumult being at length composed, he distributed corn and wine to all the citizens out of the Imperial magazines, telling them at the same time, that he hoped they would supply something towards his soldiers good supper and kind reception. A public thanksgiving was decreed next day in all the churches; and one circumstance afterwards extremely delighted the whole body of protestants throughout the empire; for the Leipsic conclusions * were signed at no great distance from the time when Francfort was taken.

The Imperial garrison upon this occasion suffered greatly in their fortunes, as well as their persons; for as this town was a sure asylum, where they had deposited most of their ill-gotten wealth, the streets, and bridge particularly, were so crowded with baggage and waggons, that retardments, confusions and obstructions soon arose; whence it happened, that numbers were taken prisoners: some threw themselves into the Oder and there were lost; some were killed with the sword (for the Swedes could not quite forget the massacre at New-Brandenburg;) so that one way or other no very considerable part of the garrison escaped. The Swedes lost about 300 men, but no officer of note. Indeed Teüffel and Hepburn were wounded, (the former circumstance we mentioned before) and colonel Dargitz † was shot through the sides. Nine hundred quintals of powder were found in the arsenal, abundance of arms, and eighteen pieces of great ordnance. A large body of troops was placed in the town by way of garrison, and Lesly commanded it, having received orders to repair the fortifications, and make improvements to them.

The taking of Francfort was a point of extraordinary consequence to his majesty's affairs. It extended his elbow-room into the rich pro-

And thus having cleared the neighbourhood of the two electors from the enemy, he reduced them to the necessity of joining with him from the rules of self preservation, because he was eventually, and in effect their master and conqueror. It delighted him also not a little to have gained this important place on Palm-Sunday, and at the critical period when the protestant confederators were assembled at Leipfic; to whom he wrote the very next morning, April the fourth, with uncommon satisfaction and self-complacency * : but, unfortunately for him, the assembly was dissolved the day before.

Schomberg and Tieffenbach merited no great praise in defending Francfort. Their greatest efforts ought to have been before the town was attacked sword in hand. They had too many cavalry in the garrison, which caused more confusion than advantage, when once the enemy entered the town. They had also, according to the Imperial custom, an immoderate number of females and superfluous attendants on the army : and it may be observed farther, that they confided likewise too much in their number of troops, and despised the besiegers to such a degree, that when the Swedish army appeared before the town, the officers thought proper to continue their mirth, and not rise from table. But this gallantry and gaiety of the besieged upon the first investing a town very rarely keeps up the same spirit to the finishing and serious conclusion of the service : and perhaps the Auftrians might have defended Francfort better, if they had been more sparing of their petulancies and scurrilities ; for they affronted the Swedes by their vain-glorious speeches and their emblematical representations, too dull, and too illiberal, to deserve the notice of the most indifferent historian. It may suffice therefore (more to the purpose) to remark here, that during this siege his majesty ordered colonel Monro to employ himself and his regiment all night in forming what was then called a running line of approach. Monro kept his soldiers to their duty, as well as he could, and never fate down till break of day. Yet the king was extremely displeas'd the next morning, when he saw how slowly the trench was advanced. Upon which two very good observations have been made by persons then employed in the Swedish service; that Gustavus being himself the best engineer of the age, expected a great deal from his officers in all sieges, and was more impatient upon those occasions than in the day of battle. The second observation was, that the Scots, however excellent in the open field, were too lazy and too proud to work, even in cases of the utmost extremity; which abated more than one half of their military merit.

Tilly had actually began his march in order to give a diversion to the affair at Francfort, but receiving upon the road the melancholy news of the ill fate, which had befallen that city, he returned and invested Magdeburg, hoping thereby to draw Gustavus out of Pomerania: but the king continued firm, nor did he choose to receive his laws of locomotion from Tilly's dictating: on the contrary he renewed his applications to the protestant princes assembled at Leipzig, and exhorted them to make a peremptory decision in behalf of their civil and religious liberties. He then wrote to the magistrates of Magdeburg, and conjured them to acquit themselves like men of honour and principle; assuring them, that if they could maintain their ground for two months, he would certainly relieve them; observing likewise, that before the time specified he could neither make the necessary dispositions with regard to his new conquests, nor collect together a body of forces sufficient to confront Tilly.

It was now indeed high time for that general to take the field, and attempt to stop the torrent of Gustavus's conquests. By orders therefore of the emperor, and his friend and patron the elector of Bavaria, he had drawn together all the troops he possibly could from the land of Juliers and East-Frizeland, the duchy of Bremen, and the circles of Suabia and Franconia. His first scheme was to give Gustavus battle; but that sort of decision the Swedish hero prudently declined. He then purposed to hinder his enemy from disturbing Pappenheim, who formed a sort of blockade round the town of Magdeburg. But new commotions broke out in the interior parts of the empire, which he thought himself obliged to compose in time; and this unhappy movement gave

Gustavus now leaving a part of his army at Francfort under Banier's command, cast a desiring eye towards Landsberg, garrisoned with 3000 foot, and 1500 dragoons. He had long wished to make himself master of this important place; for as it lay between Prussia and Poland, it was a great thorn to him in his late Polish wars. He made one fruitless attempt upon it on his first arrival in Germany, but the detachment he sent to surprize it miscarried in the attack. A second essay succeeded the foregoing, attended with the like ill-success. The town lies on the Warta, and it must be observed here, that three years had been employed in its fortifications, and the peasants for ten miles round had performed the duty of pioneers and labourers all that time. The king and Hepburn posted themselves on one side; and Horn, who had commanded the blockade, lay on the other.

This undertaking of Gustavus's was a very extraordinary attempt in two particulars; for he took with him only 2,200 commanded musqueteers, and 800 horsemen; so that the garrison exceeded him in number by 500 men: nevertheless we must not reckon the people, that attended the train of artillery, which consisted of twelve pieces of battering cannon, under the direction of that excellent officer colonel Leonard Torstenson*.

He likewise contrived to march his troops near 40 miles in two days †; and after he had effected his business returned to Francfort in the same time. In the way to Landsberg his advanced guard defeated a regiment of Croatians, the colonel that commanded the party being mortally wounded: nevertheless in their retreat they had the precaution to break down every bridge after they had passed it. 1631.

* Menro calls him Leonard Richardson, a person, whom we no where find either before or after this period. But the Christian name soon enabled me to correct the mistake; for Leonard Torstenson was then general of the artillery. And here it must be observed, that the valiant Menro, who was no great master of orthography, hardly spells any name right of man or town, usually following the German sound in pronunciation. His very style is likewise German, as Spruce for Prussia, Polack for Poland, leaguer for camp, still-stand for truce, and constast for

There lay a strong fort, well-guarded with cannon, betwixt the king and the town. Monro invested it the first night, and the king left two horsemen with him, giving them express orders to come and wake him, in case the enemy attempted to sally. Next morning the batteries played violently against it; but the parapet of earth was so compact and well-hardened, that it was soon thought proper to discontinue the attempt on that side. Under this difficulty, his majesty made himself acquainted with a blacksmith, who advised him to throw a float-bridge over one part of a wide morass all covered with water: (and here it must be observed that the king brought a small bridge from Stetin, as well as that large one we have mentioned before :) thus advancing over shallow passes, which the honest mechanic well knew, the Swedes posted themselves unexpectedly on the weak side of the fort, between that and the town. Lieutenant-colonel Dewbatel and Monro followed the blacksmith with 500 men, half dragoons and half infantry, and Hepburn moved slowly after them (for his last wound was only a contusion) at the head of one thousand musqueteers: the enemy's guard being soon routed, the fort surrendered upon composition, and the king's troops made a lodgment under the town-wall. Young Cratz, the governor, a spirited officer, whom the soldiers much confided in, being killed in a sally, and 300 Imperial troops being taken prisoners, proposals of surrender were soon offered to the king. This shameful capitulation was owing to that great error, which ran through Tilly's and Wallstein's discipline; namely, the allowing every regiment an undue number of servants, sutlers, and unnecessary dependants of all sorts. These useless mouths distressed them in the field, and starved them in besieged towns: for when this garrison marched out (and they were reputed some of the best troops in the Imperial service,) there were amongst them half as many prostitutes, as soldiers. There was one circumstance hardly to be paralleled in this capitulation. The king had once a mind to send for a detachment from his main army, before he allowed the Imperialists to march out of the 1631. town; for as the garrison out-numbered him, he was not sure but that they might give him battle in plain ground.

The town being thus evacuated, (for the Imperial troops shaped their course to Great Glogau, in Silesia) his majesty, who seldom indulged in repasts, but with politicians and ambassadors, in order to extract points of knowledge from them, allowed Banier, Bauditzen, and the other generals to take a cheerful glass, as they had nothing material to do, and no enemy to fear that evening. Nevertheless he did not honour them with his presence; however, by way of gaiety, he gave his guide the blacksmith one hundred pounds, and made him burgo-master, or in plain English, lord-mayor of Landsperg; who in the late secret attack marched with a serene countenance at the head of the detachment, and bore the whistling of the cannons and musquet-balls very well: but when the service grew serious, and several soldiers fell by him, finding, as he said, that the Swedish musquets (the powder being wet) did not make so brisk a report as the enemy's, he begged leave to run to the king, and bring a supply of better powder. It was well known what he meant by that good office.

It is amazing to imagine how much pioneer-work the king effected during this short siege with a few hands, inasmuch that it was observed on the occasion, That he made his soldiers perform for nothing what would cost another power many thousand pounds*.

By this time the Imperialists began to find the Swedes a different sort of soldiers from what they had first imagined. The emperor himself condescended to lower his tone, and at length determined to give Gustavus the appellation of king of Sweden, which he had formerly bestowed on Sigismund his rival. Thoughts were also conceived of restoring Wallstein, who at that time threw out certain innuendo's, as if he had a mind to pass into the Spanish service.

The court of Vienna and the catholic league began now to tremble in good earnest; for Pappenheim, who seldom wrote in the dejected and desponding style, informed the elector of Bavaria, that the emperor must fall, except the whole united body of catholics supported him with all their money and forces ; that Gustavus at present was sovereign arbiter of the fate of Germany ; that Francfort and Landsperg were both in his possession ; that his Swedish majesty probably (as there was no sufficient separate army to oppose him) might attempt to raise the siege of Magdeburg ; and then perhaps the flower of the Imperial soldiery might be cut off all at once : that he had it in his power to shape his victorious course whatever way he pleased : in a word, that the remaining towns ought to be duly garrisoned, and that nothing less than two strong armies could stop the violence of Gustavus's progresses : that the league only, and not the emperor, could preserve the empire : that money, either in specie or in bills of good currency, must be conveyed to Tilly and him ; and that 6000 horse, and foot proportionable, must be raised forthwith in the bishopric of Liege or duchy of Lorain. 1631.

Pomerania and the March being now cleared, his majesty had a fair entrance into Silesia and Brandenburg. Into the first he dispatched the Rhingrave and Bauditzen, who took Crossen, a considerable city on the Oder, and made excursions to Great Glogau and Walsstein's palace at Sagan. Into the second his majesty entered, throwing a bridge of boats over the Spree, and by a trumpeter summoned Wittenhorst, governor of Brandenburg, to surrender to him in twenty-four hours. Wittenhorst desired a few days respite in order to send an express to Tilly ; who first commanded him to acquit himself like a man of honour, but then directed him to capitulate, and hasten with all his garrison to him at Magdeburg. The mention of that town always brought a cloud upon Gustavus's brow : his natural spriteliness had never deserted him before ; but he foresaw its ruin, and could not prevent it.

Nevertheless, in order to leave no human methods untried (having concluded a sort of alliance with the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and duke William of Saxe-Weymar) he from Brandenburg pointed his course to Copnick, and about noon sent count Ortemberg to Berlin to demand of the elector the two towns of Custrin and Spandau, and insist likewise upon subsistence and one month's pay for his army, with a promise to re-deliver those places at two months end, or when the siege of Magdeburg

1631. burg should be raised. This demand not succeeding, Gustavus Horn was dispatched the next morning at break of day to renew the solicitation, but returned unsuccessful: his orders were to make the elector an offer of the reverfional poffeffion of the dukedom of Pomerania; but this prince, who was remarkably referved and fhy in advancing a fingle ftep towards his Swedifh majefly, excufed himfelf by alledging, That he could enter into no engagement without the participation and full confent of the elector of Saxony. The king wafled the two fucceeding days in meditation what to do, and then marched peremptorily towards Berlin at the head of five cornets of horfe, and one thoufand mufqueteers, and four field-pieces, not to make ufe of apparent force and compulfion. He had fome objection to the undertaking this enterprize on a Sunday, but the approaching fate of Magdeburg determined him.

Gustavus had extraordinary reafons to wifh to poffefs Cufttrin, not only as it was one of the ftrongeft fortifications in the empire, being protected with 150 pieces of cannon, having an arfenal furnifhed with arms fufficient to equip 20,000 men, and ftored with provifions equal to the maintenances of half that number for a competent fpace of time; but becaufe it was alfo that very important pafs, by means whereof the Imperial army had been preferved, when it fled before him from Gartz; at which period he had not intereft enough to obtain it.

Gustavus had other great defigns in poffeffing Cufttrin; for as, through the timidity of his allies, he began to fufpect he fhould not be able to raife the fiege of Magdeburg, it was then plain, that Tilly, after making himfelf mafter of that town, might by this paffage march uninterruptedly to him, and fhake the good faith of his expected ally.

It was at length agreed, that his majefly and the elector fhould have an interview in Copnick-grove, about a mile from Berlin. The elector made no advances towards a good underftanding betwixt them; for, to fay truth, the cruelties and rapines, which the houfe of Austria exercised according to antient cuftom, had frightened the German princes out of all prudence and common prefence of mind; fo that Gustavus was on the very point of breaking off the converfation, which had

lasted an hour, when the elector begged a single half-hour to re-consider the affair. Sir, said the king, *I perceive your mind to be greatly agitated, and compassionate the irresolution you labour under. It must be acknowledged, that my proposals are alarming and dangerous; but the necessity of times and circumstances demand them: it is you I am extricating from destruction, and not the subjects of Sweden:—*And then turning round to Albert duke of Mecklenberg, who stood by, Cousin, added he, be pleased to observe I take this abrupt and extraordinary step for the preservation of poor Magdeburg and the protestant religion. For if I think fit to retreat to the Baltic, where are the troops, that can obstruct my retiring? If I entrench myself on whatever tract of ground I chuse, the renowned and invincible Tilly will reflect twice or thrice before he attacks me: and if peace can once be imagined to have taken possession of my thoughts, certain it is, I may have the power of prescribing every single condition to his Imperial majesty. But how will you two sovereigns answer at the last day for the total extirpation of the reformed and evangelical religion? Forget me as much as you please—but remember the gospel: and remember too, that the type of your temporal destruction makes its first and certain appearance at the downfall of Magdeburg.*—During the sudden astonishment, which this speech occasioned, the electress, accompanied by her mother and some court-ladies, surpris'd Gustavus very critically †, who was too-well bred not to listen to the representations of the fair-sex, especially as the electress discovered that spirit of heroism, which her husband wanted. Terms now were soon agreed on, and his majesty was desired to sleep in Berlin that night, and bring with him his thousand musqueteers for his guard, and the five troops of horse.

At parting his majesty, laughing very heartily, told the electress and her train of ladies, That they did mighty well to bring about this accommodation; for in case they had not been inclined to such measures, his intention was to have sent them and the elector to have passed a summer in the cooler regions of Sweden: and when the cavalcade retired to court, Gustavus paid his honours to the fair-sex by a general salvo of his little train of artillery;

1631. but as the engineer had forgotten to turn his cannon from Berlin, the approach being first made in an hostile manner, he dismantled the tops of one or two houses; a slight inattention, which vexed the king, and put the ladies into some confusion *. Nevertheless, nothing now remained for the elector but to convey his apology to the court of Vienna, from whence it was coldly answered him, that the Swedes would spare the Marches no more than the Imperialists had done formerly.

In the course of this negotiation Spandau was granted in all appearance to his majesty during the continuance of the war, and colonel Axel Lilly was pitched upon to be appointed governor; but Custrin could not be obtained, except for the space of a single month. Be that as it will, firm assurances were given, that its gates should always be open at his majesty's command, who was allowed unmolested passage throughout the whole electorate. The elector made a copious libation that night to Bacchus, and Gustavus parted at break of day for Stetin, where he had some business to transact with the Muscovite ambassador.

In one of the pauses of the conversation above mentioned, as the elector was timorous and unwilling to consent beyond all imagination, Gustavus gave a sudden start, and turned his eyes towards Magdeburg: Let us march yonder, Sir, said he, without a moment's delay or hesitation: let us free Magdeburg, not only for our own sakes, but for the sake of the protestant cause. Upon supposition, that no man assists us, and the attempt should be rendered abortive (which neither you nor I ought to fear) at worst, Sir, we can return hither, place strong garrisons in all the conquered towns, and make a peace with the emperor upon our own terms: thus are you safe at all events. But invert the telescope, and contemplate things in another prospect. I can retire to Stockholm, and live and die peaceably in spite of the emperor. And then there will remain a certain prince, who must be exhausted and plundered without remorse, who has sacrificed the protestant religion in the most considerable part of Europe, and who must one day answer for his neglect or timidity at God's tribunal. To this the elector either durst not, or could not answer.

Gustavus marched next to Potsdam, and thence summoned the elector of Saxony to join him, or allow him free passage, as he was fully determined to raise the siege of Magdeburg; both which requests this prince denied him. His pretext was, that he could not absolve himself from the oath of fidelity he had taken to the emperor. When an interview was pressed on him, he declined accepting it, as being obliged to make a review of all his army: he dreaded another circumstance too, the drawing the war into his own country: in a word, he was like a man bewildered in a dangerous forest, who knew not which track to pursue. By this fatal resolution Magdeburg was lost, which gave many an agonizing pang to a generous and manly heart like that of Gustavus, who unboomed himself to the public in one of the best reasoned manifestos of that age, and then (to waste no farther time in fruitless complaints) set himself seriously, earnestly, and inflexibly, to make amends for the defaults of others. He forced the elector of Saxony to see his error, and formed a plan, which made him prosperous and victorious against his will, and contrary to his first intentions.

During Gustavus's political transactions at Stetin, it may be worth while to observe, that in the month of February*, the elector of Saxony, in the name of all the protestant princes, had convened the friends of liberty and Gustavus to one general assembly at Leipzig†. This meeting was both august and formidable: it consisted of the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, the margrave of Bareith, the dukes of Weymar, John, Bernard, and William; the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, the margrave of Baden-Dourlach, the prince of Anhalt, the dukes of Altenberg, Coburg, and Sultzbach: all these appeared in person. The archbishop of Bremen sent his deputy, as did the dukes of Brunswick, Lunenberg, and Mechlenberg, the margrave of Anspach, the new administrator of Wirtemberg, (duke Julius not being yet settled) and, though last, not least in protestant zeal, the good princefs, the ab-

Deputies appeared likewise from the circles of Suabia and Franconia, from various sovereign counts of the empire, and from the free towns of Strasburg, Nurenberg, Francfort, Lubec, Bremen, Brunswick, Hildesheim, Northausen, Mulhausen, and Augsburg, &c. Dr. Mathias Hoe, the elector of Saxony's domestic chaplain, opened the assembly with a very spirited discourse, nor was his text ill-chosen :

Deus, quis similis erit tibi? Nè taceas neque compeſcaris, Deus: quoniam ecce inimici tui sonuerunt: & qui oderunt te, extulerunt caput. Super populum tuum malignaverunt consilium, & cogitaverunt adversus sanctos; dixerunt, venite, & disperdamus eos, &c †. The streets were all barricadoed, the city-keys delivered every night to the elector, and no man allowed to enter the town, whose business was not precisely known; for nothing was so much dreaded upon this occasion as an Imperial spy. Yet the zealous, able, and turbulent ecclesiastic, Mathias Hoe, notwithstanding the fine spirit, which appears from his text, was supposed, being director of the elector's conscience, to have received some gratuities from the court of Vienna. Thus much is certain, he traversed Gustavus on the present occasion, though the full intent of it tended to establish a closer union between the Lutherans and the Calvinists: to which purpose one Duræus, as Grotius calls him ‡, had been sent to the assembly held at Francfort upon the Mayne not long before, furnished with conciliatory letters from the English prelates. And the opinion of Grotius concerning this convention was as follows: Rex Succiæ Magnus Gustavus non multum ante mortem, Lipsiæ conven-

* The abbess of this illustrious protestant convent is always a princess, and holds immediately under the empire. The emperor Henry the Fowler founded the convent, and his daughter Matilda was the first abbess. It is endowed with a pretty territory that lies round it. The principal persons in it, after the abbess, are a prioress, deaness, and canness, who have all handsome houses and good revenue. The number of conventual ladies, depends upon the will of the abbess, who at present is Anna Amelia, princess of Prussia; whose brother is now protector for the elector of Saxony, who sold his right in 1697, against which the late abbess, Maria Elizabeth of Holstein-Gottorp, protested more times than once, but always in vain. This abbey sends a deputy to the diet; and its contingent, upon the military establishment of the empire, is one horseman and ten foot-soldiers; a small number of knight-errants, considering the fine ladies of family and consequence they are to protect.

Nevertheless, the house of Austria made no remarkable efforts by way of opposing this assembly, taking it for granted, injudiciously enough, that the protestant princes had no other point in view than to propose some mitigations in regard to the edict of restitution: whereas the objections made by them under this article were little more than a meer pretext; for every person convened had a private view to form some connections, as far as he durst, with the king of Sweden. Yet no prince had the courage to be the first proposer of any public spirited and generous resolution, being fearful of becoming the immediate victim of the emperor's resentments, before the protestants could conjoin their forces effectually, and with a sincere intention of making good their engagements*.

The first points agitated were these that follow: To obviate the schemes, which the catholics proposed to form at their assembly, intended to be held at Francfort upon the Mayne; and next implore the emperor either to annihilate or abate the rigour of the edict of restitution: and upon supposition the court of Vienna should remain inflexible, then to conclude on proper measures for diverting the stroke, that impended over them: as also how to clear their respective dominions of the Imperial soldiers, who ravaged and destroyed every thing within their reach, contrary to the laws of the Germanic system, and the Pacta Conventa of the emperor solemnly sworn to at his coronation.

It was represented likewise, in a memorial transmitted to the emperor, That the Imperial constitutions and the laws of the Golden Bull had been violated, and the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg cruelly oppressed, the latter of which persons (though the king of Sweden possessed good part of his territories, namely, the Old and New Marches) being obliged to pay his whole contribution without abatement; which reduced him to such difficulties, that he was compelled 1631. to make retrenchments in his own table and family; nor was he able to maintain a sufficient garrison for the protection of his capital: and that several princes of the house of Saxony, for example those of Altenberg, Weymar, and Coburg, had, upon complaining of their inability to discharge their respective contributions, been threatened with the exaction of a quadruple proportion; whereas the emperor behaved with great mildness and partiality towards the subjects of his own hereditary dominions. It was agreed further, that the protestant clergy had been used with an unbecoming severity, and that new impositions were produced every day, at the arbitrary discretion of the Imperial commissaries, without consulting (conformably to the Germanic constitutions) the parties and provinces, whom the thing concerned: that the catholic armies defended shamefully to-day the very countries they devoured but yesterday: and that lands had been assigned to generals and soldiers upon the footing of a conquest: that they had been obliged to contribute to the support of ineffectual or imaginary regiments; and that sums had been levied, after the nullity of the demand had been evinced; upon which military exaction ensued: that the commissary-generals entered countries, and assigned quarters, without leave first obtained from the respective sovereigns: that outrages, thefts, and rapes, were matters of common practice; and that agriculture and commerce were both exterminated from the territories of the empire. Nevertheless, the whole was represented in the supplicatory style, with an air of modesty; each person being determined (so far as was consistent with public good and private conscience) to maintain due loyalty and obedience to the emperor*.

Gustavus took care to apply fuel to this protestant flame, and sent privately Chemnitius and other politicians, charged with these secret instructions; first, by way of preliminary, (having mentioned the alliance concluded with France) to cultivate the elector of Saxony's good graces with particular attention, as the princes and deputies all took their language from him: and then, secondly, (upon which the king most set his heart) to induce the several assembled protestants to against the emperor : but, thirdly, if some should think these measures over-violent, and inconsistent with that obedience, which the Germanic body owes its chief, then to allure them to raise troops for the protection of their respective territories, and allow him, Gustavus, who alone defended their religion, lives, and properties, a certain annual pension or subscription for the support of the common cause, as also free passage, provisions, forage, and permission likewise to enter into fortified towns in case of a retreat : and, lastly, if neither the bold nor the moderate proposal should please them, then to suggest a still gentler method, and insist upon their forming separate alliances amongst themselves, which they were to keep secret till time of need.

Never were proposals better calculated, either by a brave man or a cautious one : how they were relished, or how they were answered, cannot from history be ascertained ; but sure we are, that this account of the affair was allowed by Oxenstiern to be genuine. But what could be done with a prince of such strange dispositions as the elector of Saxony ? who, though he opened the assembly with a well promising speech, was so circumstanced, that it was extremely difficult to manage him. He hated war, and was greatly addicted to the pleasures of hunting and drinking : he had an implicit confidence in the king of Denmark, and a radical disgust to the king of Sweden ; and the rather, as their pretensions co-incided with respect to the bishoprics of Magdeburg and Halberstadt. He had, moreover, conceived both dread and jealousy against the house of Weymar, under pretence, that the princes of the union, in the Anhaltine papers found at the battle of Prague, had promised his electorate (concerning which promise we know nothing certain) to a duke of Sax-Weymar, descended from that line, which Charles V. had deprived : he was partial likewise to the Imperial interests, through antient habitude ; and was induced thereto by some private reasons : for Bohemia and the incorporated provinces lay contiguous to his territories, and he always hoped to obtain some grants upon them, in case the house of Austria grew prosperous in her victories. To complete all this, he professed an aversion to 1631. all foreign interferences in the empire, and, what was still more, had one favourite principle at heart, which was to bring about a general peace in Germany, and transfer the seat of war into some foreign country, as Sweden, Poland, the Valteline and Italy. In this object he had two views, to give a diversion to the enterprising ambition of the Austrian family, and maintain his own country in repose till he could indemnify himself for the fatigues, expences, and depopulations of a tedious war. These were Arnheim's maxims rather than his own. And besides all this, the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, who was the elector's son-in-law, held a strict correspondence with the Imperial ministry; and Francis Albert duke of Saxe-Lauenberg, who then served under Gustavus, was still more liable to suspicion. What embroiled matters more at the court of Dresden, was, that Arnheim, general in chief of the Saxon army, had served many years under Walstein, in the capacity of his obsequious creature and most implicit follower. This mean compliance of his temper might not have made him formidable; but his artifices and dissimulation were unparalleled. Richelieu used to say, the church lost in him the completest Jesuit that ever lived *; and (having been often tormented with his

* Or, as Grotius has delivered down the anecdote in a private conference, "robbed the world of the most insidious and negotiating cardinal, that the see of Rome could ever have produced."

John George Arnheim was a gentleman of Brandenburg. He had an inventive head in matters of dissimulation, artifice, and deceit, and may be considered as the prime author of all the elector of Saxony's duplicity. Amongst other things, he betrayed the Swedes in 1633, and negotiated the alliance between his master and the emperor, being always a creature, who subjected himself to the ferula of Walstein. His behaviour to count Thurn and Dewbatel was highly ungenerous; for he attacked them in the night whilst they were his allies and serving him; took all their foldiers prisoners, and transferred them to the Imperial service. Walstein, who was magnificent in every thing, where his private passions were unconcerned, was so ashamed of this action, that he dismissed these officers without ransom; a piece of private history, which few historians have been able to account for, as no prisoner would have been so acceptable to the emperor as the former.

Arnheim being taken by the Swedes in some rencounter about the year 1638, was conducted with great joy to Stockholm, and made a state-prisoner in the castle there. M. du Maurier tells us †, that he often saw him at his window reclining his head on his hand, and musing like a man, that seemed lost in meditation. He at length gave a new proof of his abilities in stratagem; for pretending to be in a sort of dying condition, he signified to the ministry, that he could make a disposition of part of his estate by sale greatly to his advantage, if they would grant a passport to one of the gentlemen his tergiversations and shifting parties) rejoiced and made little gesticulations like a child, when the Swedes took him prisoner. Nor was the general alone insincere to the Swedish cause; for the chaplain had his share, and the ministry likewise.

Upon the whole, it may suffice to observe, that the elector of Saxony wanted to please, and not displease, both contending parties; a task unworthy of a great man, because of the improbable success which attends it, and too difficult for a weak or timorous man to execute; the result of whose wonderful cunning and address is, to render each party discontented!

After various debates, it was at length agreed by universal consent, "To petition for the revocation of the edict; to relieve the protestant princes and states, that were oppressed; and maintain the Augsburg confession in its full vigour and purity: to demand, that the Imperial troops should be removed; otherwise not to grant them passage, provisions, or quarters: to preserve the liberties of the Germanic body without infringing the prerogative of the emperor: to restore peace consistently with law, and renew old friendship with the papists: to find expedients, whereby they might realize the proposals made at the diet of Ratibon; and, above all, to put themselves in a posture of defence, in order to preserve their ecclesiastical possessions, and oppose the completion of the edict of restitution."

Each circle, prince, and state, was to subscribe a certain contingent of men and money in defence of their lives, their properties, religion, of his retinue to cross over into Germany, having invested the said trusty person with proper authorities. The regency made no difficulty of complying with so reasonable a request, and Arnheim artfully chose a day to dispatch his agent, when great rejoicings were made for the birth of a dauphin of France. Upon this pretext Arnheim's retinue made a public dinner, and distributed rich wines in great abundance to the persons, that guarded their master, and in the close of the evening Arnheim (who was supposed to be dying) issued out with the gentleman his agent in the character of his livery foot-man, well muffled in a large riding coat. He reached the sea-coast with great celerity, and transported himself in a little vessel into Germany. The remainder of his family at Stockholm carried on the farce with great solemnity; and as his pretended illness kept him from visitants, too much time elapsed to give the ministry any opportunity of retaking him. The success of this artifice threw Oxenstierna into great inquietudes †.

1631. and liberty, conformably to the laws of the Germanic system, and the common principles of self-preservation.

They then entered into a common treaty to assist and vindicate one another, and a chosen juncto (of a few only) was appointed for the more speedy dispatch of important businesses, vested with full authority to act for the rest. And lastly, it was resolved, by way of corroborating their interests, and giving sanction to their determinations, to invite the king of Denmark, the duke of Holstein, and the maritime towns of the Augustan possession, to accede; and that letters should be addressed to all foreign protestant princes and states upon the same subject. Nor must I here omit, that it was determined upon the whole to raise an army of 40,000 men*, with restrictions to all outward appearance of acting only in a defensive capacity. Care was taken likewise not to mention a single syllable with reference to the irruption of Gustavus into Lower-Saxony; nor was the least promise made of affording any assistances to the emperor.

Thus ended the famous Leipzig conclusions; and the assembly was dissolved on Palm-Sunday, the 3d of April. Of all which proceedings the elector of Saxony sent the emperor and the catholic electors a seemingly minute and circumstantial account; imploring the former in terms as strongly conceived as can be imagined, to exert the greatest power the Supreme Being had been pleased to bestow on any prince in Europe, in a manner worthy of the giver and the possessor, so as to restore the empire to its antient peace, and prevent a scene of blood-shed and ruin, the largest in extent, and the most dreadful in its consequences, that the world perhaps might ever see. He then observed, that the confederations made at Leipzig turned purely on the defensive side of the question; and what had been there determined, related only to personal preservation, and not the destruction of others. Be that as it will, this last attempt was unsuccessful; for the emperor would not expunge one tittle in the edict of restitution. Of course the Saxon letter was filled with a repetition of old complaints, and the Imperial answer (which consisted of two monitory epistles, conceived and expressed with great acrimony against the several princes lately assembled at Leipzig) breathed nothing but repentment and indignation. To this succeeded a prohibition of raising troops directed against each and every potentate of the evangelical; and the reformed persuasion; and strict injunctions were addressed to the catholic powers, commanding them to withhold all assistances from the protestants, under pain of confiscating their respective fiefs. During this contrariety of sentiments, some foreign powers interfered, with a view to make these distractions more unfavourable to the house of Austria, at whose overgrown power they had reason to be alarmed; and all the good Gustavus could obtain from the elector of Saxony was, permission to transport provisions and powder through his dominions to the distressed garrison at Magdeburg. As for money he refused to contribute a single farthing; nor would he agree to unite his troops with those of his majesty, and conjointly raise the siege. The king petitioned like a suppliant for free possession of Dessau-bridge, and besought the elector to meet him and his army on the opposite banks of the Elb, from whence he purposed, that they should march conjointly to Magdeburg, requesting likewise to have leave given him to embark his artillery and heavy baggage at Wittemberg, and promising to give him draughts on the banquiers of Hamburg or Amsterdam for immediate payment of all the expences. But the elector continued like a man petrified, and referred all to the example of the elector of Brandenburg*.

But Gustavus had no patience to see the distress of the unhappy town of Magdeburg, and renewing his solicitations by a second letter, far more urgent than the former, told the elector, that he considered his first denials as marks of politeness and respect to the emperor; but that a higher obligation now ought to influence his actions, namely, his duty to God, and his affection to his faithful subjects. As to the approach of Aldringer and the German army, that had served in Italy, he 1631. confessed himself to be no ways dismayed at such an event, and recommending a personal interview to his electoral highness (as business of consequence could not be carried on by the intercourse of letters and the tedious perplexities of public ministers) besought him in one word to remember his sons and the archbishopric of Magdeburg *.

Mean while Tilly employed himself seriously about the siege of Magdeburg †, a town of great strength, in one of the most populous and fertile parts of North-Germany, situated between the electorates of Saxony and Brandenburg. This scheme of the Imperial general was not amiss. He wanted to strike some stroke of consequence to counterbalance the glory of Gustavus, and raise the reputation and spirits of his own army. He hoped likewise by a decisive action of this sort to fix the two wavering electors to the interests of the house of Austria, but overturned all this plan hereafter by his own eagerness and indiscretion.

Pappenheim had formed a blockade round this city some weeks before, and, as he always relied upon the pen as well as the sword, had made the governor an offer by letter of vast sums of money, and the title of count of the empire. Upon this occasion, Falkenberg acted both with prudence and spirit; for he examined the trumpeter, who delivered the letter in presence of all his officers, sending word back to Pappenheim (for he did not write) that he might find at home the sort of men he wanted, but that Falkenberg was not a person of that stamp: and, friend, said he, to the messenger, whoever comes here again upon such an errand, shall receive an halter for the decoration of his neck, instead of a gold chain; which in those days was the present of honour ‡.

† Magdeburg, or Maiden-town, bears for arms a virgin crowned, supposed to be Venus, who was worshipped in this country till the reign of Charlemagne, who converted some of the Saxons to Christianity. Its duchy is 180 miles long and 96 broad. In the town there is a copy extant of a painting of Venus, which was preserved here in a place un-noticed till the year 780. In this picture was a golden car, drawn by two swans, and two white doves. A naked Venus leans forward, having a rose in her mouth, and a myrtle-garland on her head; the tresses of her hair waving. In her left-hand she holds the terrestrial globe; in her right three golden apples. On her left-breast is a pointed dart, on her right a blazing torch. Behind the car stand the three graces with their arms folded.

Tilly invested Magdeburg about the beginning of March, and soon made himself master of various forts and outworks : one by way of peculiar strength was called Pappenheim's Fort *, and was so named in order to imply, that it was an object worthy of that general's ardor and courage. Nevertheless, Pappenheim took it sword in hand. Another was called Tilly's Disgust, which underwent the same fate. The Toll-sconce, which the Imperial general attacked last, cost him the lives of 500 men. It was defended vigorously by Falkenberg †, the governor, who had thrown himself into the town in the habit of a peasant several weeks before ; yet he ought to have maintained this outwork (which commanded the bridge) at all hazards, since from the moment it became a prey to the enemy, the city, which was of great extent, though commanded by no eminence, was left naked to the enemy, being defended only by the town-walls and a rampart, not extremely strong.

But though the governor was a good officer, matters went not extremely to his satisfaction within the walls. His garrison was weak, consisting of but 2000 foot and 250 horse, new-raised levies, and ill-paid. The money promised by Gustavus to the administrator ‡ could not be conveyed to him at the day appointed ; for the enemy had invested the town somewhat sooner than was expected. Tilly had pensioners among the magistrates, who betrayed the debates of every council. The town was ill-supplied with provisions. The commander moreover wanted powder ; which was partly owing to an indiscreet enterprize in one of his officers, who, just before Tilly's army invironed the town, went with a detachment to fetch 200 quintals, that were lodged in the bailywic of Gomern, ten miles distance from Magdeburg : and then out of pure gaiety of courage, hearing that count Ladron, a Bavarian colonel, was coming down the Elb with a party of troops, made a digression from the object of his journey, and killed him and most of his escort within sight of Dessau-bridge, in whose fortress the 1631. Imperialists had a garrison; whilst the powder very unfortunately fell into the enemy's hands.

Amongst other expectances, this discretionary adventurer conceived a vain hope of seizing papers of great consequence from the elector of Bavaria to Tilly: but a single line of consequence was never discovered; and not being able (by reason of the digression he had made) to repass the enemy's lodgments and enter Magdeburg, he retired with great discomposure to Leipzig, for it is thought he killed Ladron and his men in a very unsoldier-like manner, and being there seized with the plague, died delirious under extraordinary remorse and horrors.

Mean while, according to the custom of the times, many furious sallies were made, some successful, and some unprosperous. Falkenberg conducted one or two, which shewed more zeal than discretion. However, Pappenheim in a particular rencounter had like to have been killed or taken prisoner; which single event might have given a turn to the whole state of affairs.

In about a month Tilly began to cannonade the town very furiously; having raised four batteries against the new city, each mounted with sixteen pieces of large artillery. On the seventh day from that period, he carried his entrenchments to the foot of the wall (the town-ditch being dry*;) yet the breach was not large enough to be esteemed assaultable. Nevertheless he flattered himself, that the city would then surrender; having negotiated an accommodation by the means of the Hanse-towns; but it was only the amusement of false hope. The troops did their duty with incredible spirit on both sides, so fierce and so uninterrupted a firing had not been seen in those wars before. There was likewise great mining and countermining; for Gustavus had taught both enemies and friends to be more compendious in the affair of sieges. Tilly wrote divers letters to the administrator and chief magistrates, but they rejected all accommodation, and ordered the cannoniers to fire with double diligence. He had observed particularly, that Falkenberg owed an allegiance to the emperor, as being a German born; to which the governor returned this short answer: I agree with the administrator and the senators; and will take care neither to hurt my conscience as a Christian, nor my reputation as a soldier *. In consequence of this, Tilly, on the eighth of May, sent a trumpeter in form to propose a capitulation, who was detained in town till the tenth before a proper answer could be dispatched to the Imperial general. During this interval, the batteries played night and day without intermission: at length the tower and bastion of the new gate were overturned; the Imperialists crowded from all parts to begin the storm, but the breach was not to be entered with common safety. By this time powder grew so scarce within the city, that the inhabitants were forced to grind it with hand-mills.

During the detention of Tilly's trumpeter, the administrator dispatched another to him, offering to enter into terms, on condition Tilly preserved the privileges of the city, and left him in possession of the archbishopric; protesting further, that he would abide by any subsequent articles, that the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg should agree to. But the Imperial general did not chuse to assent to this proposal, having previously felt the pulses of these princes on the occasion, who excused themselves, and requested the favour of continuing neutral, partly through fear of disobliging their protestant brethren, and partly because the aspect of things appeared at that time somewhat indistinct on the Imperial side.

Thus Tilly kept up still an uninterrupted fire, and made galleries along the fossé, that fronted the Sudenburg and the new town. He then ceased firing.

The citizens vainly hoped, that the Imperialists had formed a design to raise the siege. It is more than probable, that Tilly intended they should think so: be that as it will, the same night he summoned a general council of war; of which the result was, that an universal attack should be given the next morning at break of day, when it was supposed, (and not without reason,) that half the garrison would be asleep; not only because the besieged were extremely fatigued, but be-

1631. cause most of them were persuaded, that the enemy was determined to shift his quarters ; a circumstance, which Tilly's agents within the walls took care to propagate with additions and improvements.

The tenth of May the Imperial general held another council of war at one in the morning, with a view, that no secret might have time to spread itself abroad. The important affair was debated and re-considered once more : and the majority, with Pappenheim at their head, resolved (as at the last council) in the affirmative ; though all agreed, that the breaches were not in that condition, which a prudent besieger would wish to have them. But Pappenheim, who had an appetite for danger, and who thought many things were done by the mere dint of resolving to do them, declared strenuously (as was usually his custom) for the fighting part. His personal courage made him the darling of the soldiers, and his great experience, prudence, presence of mind in danger, and above all his inventive faculty in military stratagems, made the other generals listen to him with respect and pleasure.

At the head of Savelli's, Wrangel's and Gronsfelt's regiments (and when we speak of Imperial regiments it must be observed, that they were at least double in number to those of Gustavus) he began the attack, on the late-erected fortifications of the new city (which was near the banks of the Elb, and where the administrator commanded) precisely at five in the morning, one piece of cannon being discharged by way of signal to all the troops. His watch-word was Jesu Maria (the same afterwards used at the battle of Leipzig) and each soldier wore a white ribbon on his right-arm*.

At the same instant two other attacks were commenced with an equal number of troops, conducted by Adolphus duke of Holstein, and count Mansfelt: the latter attempted the Sudenburg-quarter near the great cathedral, where Falkenberg commanded, and the former directed his force against the Cröcken-gate, which watch master general Amsteroth undertook to maintain. The defence of the banks of the Elb (that river not being supposed passable by reason of its depth, and through want of boats) was left to the care of fishermen, and some few other inhabitants *. Tilly dismissed his officers with a short speech, and kept aloof at the head of a body of reserve, in order to convey supports and assistances wherever they might be wanted. 1631.

Mean while all things kept as quiet within the town, as if nothing had been in agitation. Falkenberg, after watching the whole night in the ramparts, was unfortunately gone to a council held at the town-hall, in order to dispatch the trumpeter above-mentioned to Tilly, as was also the administrator.

Pappenheim, the mean while in the post of honour allotted for him, having ordered all his cavalry to dismount in an instant, drove the city-soldiers out of the faussebraie, and obliged them to retreat behind the upper wall. He next caused the new work to be attacked, and then filing along under the town-wall, upon which was ranged a battery of cannon, made one furious effort upon the last parapet. Hither Falkenberg flew from the senate-house, with all the troops he could collect together, and pushed him back beyond the new work, marching over the bodies of a hundred slaughtered Imperialists. At length being mortally wounded, he was obliged to be carried back to the nearest part of the town, where he continued to give his orders with unparalleled resolution †.

Mean while Pappenheim perceiving the courage of the besieged to slacken, and making a second attempt with greater success than he could have flattered himself, entered the streets about seven in the morning. It was then that Falkenberg greatly wanted his cavalry, which might have overborn the enemies before their own horse were admitted ; but he found to his great mortification in his dying moments, that some perfidious citizens had barricaded the streets with chains. All we know further with respect to him is, that his body perished in the flames.

* Chemnitius, 126. Brachel. 251.

† In this conflict the traitor Quinti Aligheri was killed, who, as Chemnitz tells us, was lieutenant-colonel in the regiment of Savelli : but a subsequent account [page 237] gives that post to don Joseph de Ainsa. Nevertheless the difficulty may be easily solved. Theodanus in his narrative calls Ainsa the lieutenant-colonel, some days after the action, by which time the general might have filled up the vacant commission.

1631. During this rencounter one captain Smith greatly signalized himself: he repulsed the Imperialists a second time, but an unfortunate shot soon put an end to his generous efforts; and when the alarm-bell began to sound, the citizens lost all courage, and each man provided for his own private safety by retiring to his own house, or attempting to abscond and shelter his person elsewhere. The duke of Holstein *, by Pappenheim's assistance, then entered the Hamburg-gate, after having made several unsuccessful attempts before, and pointed the cannon of the ramparts against the streets. At length Mansfelt got into the town, and in the interim the cavalry broke in like a torrent through the Hamburg-gate. This hindered the remaining part of the garrison from uniting, and making one general defence in the public square.

The administrator, at the beginning of the first attack, had his thigh ruffled with a cannon-ball, and received afterwards several musquet-shots, one particularly in the left-leg: he was at length taken prisoner, under promise of kind and humane usage suitable to his quality; yet soon after some fresh soldiers fell upon him, who not only killed his domestics, that attended him, but gave him two wounds in cold blood, one with a pistol on the leg, and one with a battle-ax on the head. They then stripped him almost naked, and had dispatched him without remorse, if Pappenheim had not flown to his assistance, and ordered him to be carried on two pikes to his tent, fainting, and half-naked. Next morning Pappenheim conveyed him in a coach to Wolmerstadt, and ordered his own chaplain and gentleman of the bed-chamber to attend him. The dukes of Holstein and Saxony † had the unpoliteness to reproach him in very gross terms; but he defended the justice of his cause with manly answers, and acquitted himself conformably to the spirit of a prince and man of honour.

Some time afterwards Pappenheim asked him, how he could be so ill-advised as to expose his life, and all that he possessed, for the sake of persons, who told him every day, and informed the besiegers of the order of the guard, the numbers destined to the support of each station, the weakness of the fortifications, and the several inconveniencies they laboured under? That conformably to these reports he had laid the plan of the last attack, and thereby judged precisely when and where to make it. 1631.

When the administrator was brought before Tilly, he told him and his generals boldly ; That the Supreme Being would take vengeance upon them : that blood could only be expiated with blood : that acts of massacre were fatal to armies ; and that sooner or later the catholic forces would suffer justly an equal degree of chastisement with what they had inflicted : that the Imperial cause was verging towards its decline, and the glory of Tilly lay interred in the ruins of Magdeburg.

And now began a massacre not to be paralleled in modern ages. I know nothing approaches to it but the storming of Drogheda by Cromwell, who seems to have copied Tilly in the very meanest part of his character. The soldiers fired promiscuously in the streets, churches and squares, upon persons of all ages, sex, and conditions, with the same fury as in the day of battle. The very best troops, the old Walloons, behaved the least like men, and, as there may be a justice sometimes in cruelty, spared not their own friends within the town, namely, the informers, in the general massacre. The Croats exercised barbarities unknown to savages. The young men and the new-raised soldiers were the only people, that shewed any visible signs of compassion. When the streets and public places were filled with dead bodies, (and this scene may be considered as the very mildest part of their cruelty) the troops disbanded themselves, and began to enter the houses. Here began a more deliberate perpetration of murder: even the aged, the sick, and the young, found no mercy. Two soldiers held an infant by the legs with the head downwards, and chined it with their swords. Eight Croats violated a poor girl, and then transixed her to the ground with an halbert. A young lady of quality was seized by an officer, but as he dragged her over the Elb-bridge, she begged leave to have the use of her hands to 1631. take out her handkerchief and wipe her eyes, and that instant plunged herself into the river, and there expired. Another young woman of fashion, remarkable for her beauty, knowing that in such a case her charms were the least part of her protection, deliberately plunged herself into a well: and twenty young girls, who were assembled together* at a house near the banks of the Elb, rushed out of the doors all at once, and embracing each other, threw themselves into the river.

By this time the whole city was in flames. Most historians attribute this to accident; but as the fire began in various places at once, many may be inclined to consider it as a part of the besieger's cruelty. Thus the few perished, who had concealed themselves, and by the justice of Providence, the Imperialists lost the greater part, not only of what they had plundered, but of what the inhabitants had hidden.

Nothing remained of the town but the cathedral, the church and convent of Notre Dame, some few houses, that stood round it, and about eighty or an hundred fishermen's cottages on the banks of the Elb. Out of 40,000 inhabitants †, it is thought, hardly the number of 800 escaped. Some retired to the cathedral, some obtained quarter in hopes

* The author of the Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg is pleased to do more honour to the heroic virtue of the fair-sex than my collections can authorize me to set forth; for he makes the number of these Clælia's amount, according to some relations, to 1200.

† When I say 40,000 inhabitants, I speak only from others, it being my own private opinion, that including the garrison, there could not be above that number in the town: nevertheless sure it is, that many gentry in the neighbourhood, and many country people, who had connexions with the citizens, refuged themselves therein. It may be proper therefore upon this occasion to give a transcript verbatim from the German relator, whom I have twice quoted already. "It is impossible, saith he, to ascertain the number of persons, that perished in the city; for the sword and fire made equal ravages, and the flames, perhaps, destroyed as many persons, if not more, than the cruelty of the barbarians; for when the vaults and cellars came to be opened, in most of them were found three, four, or five women and children, who had been suffocated. The number of the dead cannot be judged from the list of burials; for some suppose 6,440 bodies to be thrown into the Elb, not to mention those, which the fire consumed, and others, that were buried in the ruins; so that a quarter of a year elapsed before many could be found. From the few survivors we might have received some certain intelligence, but most of them were carried into different camps, from whence they escaped and dispersed themselves over Germany and Europe. According to the common opinion and report, it was judged, that about 400 citizens remained alive (meaning those that Tilly found in the great cathedral) "part whereof were detained prisoners with their

of ransom, some escaped over the walls, some were dug out of the ruins, and some few were preserved by the seeming interposition of Providence. An handful of the garrison, which held out to the very last man, obtained conditions ; but all the officers were put to the sword, excepting Amsteroth, who was taken prisoner, and died the next day, and a lieutenant-colonel and major, whose lives were spared. 1631.

When one considers Tilly's bigotry and extreme aversion to the protestants, Pappenheim may be easily excused from being the author of this monstrous scene of cruelty. Why else did Tilly make but momentary visits to the town, which laboured then under so extraordinary misfortunes? or why, when some of the officers made remonstrances to him, did he reply coldly and unconcernedly: The town must bleed: it hath not yet made sufficient expiation. Let the soldiers persist another hour, and then we will re-consider the matter!

Some have said in behalf of the Imperial general, (and Cromwell is reported to have made the same excuse) that severities of this kind were exercised only in terrorem. But if that had been the case, the garrison alone was the true object of resentment; an act, even in that light, highly unjustifiable, being disgraceful to common humanity, and irreconcilable with the prudence of a great commander, who knows the revolution of chances in war, and never desires to make it more bloody than it is well known to be in its own nature.

Three days after the assault, the Imperial general made his public entrance into the town, and went directly to the cathedral, where about 400 people of both sexes had locked in and barricaded themselves, having neither eat nor drank since the city was stormed. He ordered them some provisions, imprisoned the men in the administrator's palace, and sent the women and children into his camp. He is said to have repeated the following passages from Virgil on the occa-

He examined the few surviving soldiers of the garrison with great attention, being determined to make an example of all deserters, and reproached them (for which there was no reason) for making, as he said, so poor a defence ; and then gave his orders, that plundering should cease from that moment. Next morning a dreadful fire broke out in his camp, fortunately enough for Stalman, the Swedish resident, who had been confined there under a close guard ; for amidst the extraordinary hurry and confusion he recovered his liberty, and rejoined his master †.

These barbarities touched the king of Sweden to the very heart, and raised his indignation to such a pitch, that he protested firmly, with a tone of anger, that he would be revenged on the old corporal for this massacre, or lose his life in the attempt. To give vent to his passion, he published a sensible and well-reasoned manifesto, wherein he plainly shewed, that the citizens of Magdeburg in general had behaved very insincerely with him, having made no subscription for their common defence, nor given any proper accommodations to the garrison till the town was actually invested ; and then such assistances were administered grudgingly, and came too late.—That they had turned a deaf ear to the representations of the administrator last summer ; who, if his remonstrances could have carried any weight with them, would have frustrated Pappenheim in the blockade he then formed ; and allowed his majesty to have planned out some fortifications, which might have rendered the town impregnable, and consequently have removed the seat of war into some other country.—He taxed the inhabitants with infidelity to the protestant cause, and reminded them of the supplies he to any promise of raising the siege, he desired the public to reflect, that such engagements carry a tacit implication with them of being eventual, and must be regulated by convenience, possibility, and the state of things. And here he observed occasionally, that after having made himself master of Gartz and Griffenhagen, he had certainly ruined the separate army under Schomberg, and in consequence thereof raised the siege of Magdeburg too, if the governor of Custrin, (which belonged to the elector of Brandenburg) had not denied him the possession of that town at so critical a conjuncture. He then continued to remark, that it was incumbent upon him, before he marched to relieve Magdeburg, to take Francfort, clear the Imperial troops dispersed along the banks of the Oder and the Silesian side of the Warta, and defeat Schomberg, who was superior to him in cavalry, and consequently had the power of harassing the rear of his army, or disturbing his quarters every moment.—That Tilly during this interval had greatly strengthened the army of observation, which lay near Francfort; so that it was dangerous to make long marches, or considerable movements, when a superior force had always the power to tread on his heels.—Nevertheless, such was his Swedish majesty's zeal, that for the sake of relieving Magdeburg, he made that hasty and furious storm on Francfort, and thence marched to Spandau, where he found a reserved and jejune reception from the elector of Brandenburg: adding likewise, that the duke of Saxony had denied him provisions and boats to convey his troops down the Elb, and had refused him a passage over that large river, either at Wittemberg or the Dessau-bridge; so that hitherto he could pronounce nothing with certainty concerning those two princes, till they had spirit and magnanimity enough to take off the mask, and act as open enemies or declared friends. Lastly, all the world might see, that his interest and inclination were both equally concerned in the relief of Magdeburg, since upon the news of its being taken, he was obliged to cause his army to retreat, and vary the whole plan of his operations. Nevertheless, he even then had relieved Magdeburg, if the said electors had co-operated.

Many preceding accidents and prodigies were called to mind upon the completion of this event, conformably to the reigning disposition of that age. Some weeks before the blockade was formed a part of the city-wall tumbled down without any assignable reason †.

When the administrator mounted his horse at Hamburg, in order to take possession of the town, two loud sudden thunder-claps were heard in a clear sky.

Whilst Tilly held his council of war at Hamelen in company with Pappenheim, Gronsfelt, commissary general Rupa, and others, and determined at once to undertake the siege, immediately arose a hurricane, which overturned a magazine of powder with such force, that the falling stones struck fire, and so astonishing an explosion ensued, that they all fell down on their knees, and offered up their prayers, supposing it to be an earthquake. The same storm reached Magdeburg; for Falkenberg, who happened at that time to be riding in the fields, was thrice blown off his horse: and the statues of the wise virgins (which stood in Paradise-chapel, belonging to the great cathedral) were overturned, and their lamps thrown out of their hands ‡.

But the prodigy, which puzzled all men, and concerning which we have spoken incidentally in another place, was what happened to an exempt corporal's wife, who died in labour with inexpressible agonies, in the new city, which Pappenheim stormed, requesting above all things, that her body might be opened, which produced to the public a boy as large as a child three years old, clothed in armour of flesh like a coat of mail; and, if the reader chuses to peruse the account in its original form (for all authors mention it) he may find the exactest description in the places referred to at the bottom of the page ||.

But to return to the massacre at Magdeburg: in the opinion of many judicious readers, I may be thought to violate the dignity of history, by “ stretched on the floor, and very weak. I gave him such consolation “ as the disorders of my mind would permit me: he heard me with great “ attention, and ordered a small present of gold to be given me, which “ I left on the table. In this interval the enemy poured in by crouds “ at the Hamburg-gate, and fired upon the multitude as upon beasts of “ prey. Suddenly my wife and maid-servant entered the room, and per“ suaded me to remove immediately, alledging we should meet with no “ quarter, if the enemy found us in an apartment filled with arms. We “ run down into the court-yard of the house, and placed ourselves in “ the gateway. Our enemies soon burst the gate open, with an eager“ ness that cannot be described. The first compellation they bestowed “ on me was, Priest, deliver thy money. I gave them about four-and-“ twenty shillings in a little box, which they accepted with good-will;

 “ but when they opened the box, and found only silver, they raised “ their tone of language, and demanded gold. I represented to them, “ that I was at some distance from my house, and that at present I could “ not possibly give them more. They were reasonable enough to be “ contented with my answer, and left us, after having plundered the “ house, without offering us any insult. There was a well-looking “ youth among the croud, to whom my wife addressed herself, and be“ sought him in God’s name to protect us: My dear child, said he, it is “ a thing impossible: we must pursue our enemies; and so they retired.

“ In that moment another party of soldiers rushed in, who demanded
 “ also our money. We contented them with seven shillings, and a “ couple of silver spoons, which the maid fortunately had concealed in “ her pocket. They were scarce gone, before a soldier entered alone, “ with the most furious countenance I ever saw. Each cheek was “ puffed out with a musquet-ball, and he carried two musquets on his “ shoulder. The moment he perceived me, he cried with a voice of “ thunder, Priest, give thy money, or thou art dead. As I had nothing “ to give him, I made my apology in the most affecting manner: he “ levelled a piece to shoot me, but my wife luckily turned it with her “ hand, and the ball passed over my head. At length, finding we had “ no money, he asked for plate: my wife gave him some silver trinkets, 1621.

 “ and he went his way.

“ A little after came four or five soldiers, who only said, Wicked “ priest, what dost thou here? Having said thus much, they departed.

“ We were now inclined to shelter ourselves in the uppermost lodg“ ings of the house, hoping to be there less exposed, and better con“ cealed. We entered a chamber, that had several beds in it, and “ passed some time there in the most insupportable agonies. Nothing “ was heard in the streets but the discharge of musquets, and the “ cries of expiring people: nor were the houses much more quiet;
 “ every thing was burst open, or cut to pieces. We were soon dis“ covered in our retirement: a number of soldiers poured in, and one,
 “ who carried an hatchet, made an attempt to cleave my skull; but a “ companion hindered him, and said, Comrade, what are you doing!
 “ Don't you perceive, that he is a clergyman!

“ When these were gone, a single soldier came in, to whom my “ wife gave a crape handkerchief off her neck: upon which he re“ tired without offering us any injury. His successor was not so rea“ sonable; for entering the chamber with his sword drawn, he im“ mediately discharged a blow on my head, saying, Priest, give me thy “ money. The stroke stunned me, the blood gushed out in abundance, “ and frightened my wife and servant to that degree, that they both
 “ aimed a blow at her, but it glanced fortunately on her gown, which “ happened to be lined with furs, and wounded her not. Amazed to “ see us so submissive and patient, he looked at us fixedly for some mo“ ments. I laid hold of this interval to represent to him, that I was “ not in my own house, being come to the place where I was, to dis“ charge my duty to a dying person; but if he would grant us quarter, “ and protect us to our home, I would then bestow upon him all I had.
 “ Agreed, priest, said he, give me thy wealth, and I will give thee the watch- “ word: it is Jesu Maria; pronounce that, and no one will hurt thee. We “ went down stairs directly, highly contented to have found such a “ protector. The street was covered with the dead and dying; their

1631. “ cries were enough to have pierced the hearts of the greatest barbarians. We walked over the bodies, and when we arrived at the church of St. Catharine, met an officer of distinction on horseback. This generous person soon discovered us, and seeing me covered with blood, said to the person, who conducted us, Fellow soldier, fellow soldier, take care what you do to these persons. At the same time he said to my wife; Madam, is yonder house yours? My wife having answered it was: Well, added he, take hold of my stirrup, conduct me thither, and you shall have quarter. Then turning to me, and making a sign to the soldiers with his hand, he said to me, Gentlemen of Magdeburg, you yourselves are the occasion of this destruction; you might have acted otherwise. The soldier, who had used me ill, took this opportunity to steal away. Upon entering my house, we found it filled with a multitude of plunderers, whom the officer (who was a colonel *) ordered away. He then said he would take up his lodging with us, and having posted two soldiers for a guard to us, left us with a promise to return forthwith. We gave, with great cheerfulness, a good breakfast to our centinels, who complimented us on the lucky fortune of falling into their colonel's hands; at the same time representing to us, that their fellow-soldiers made a considerable booty, whilst they continued inactive, merely as a safe-guard to us, and therefore beseeching us to render them an equivalent to a certain degree. Upon this I gave them four rose-nobles, with which they were well contented, and shewed so much humanity, as to make us an offer to go and search for any acquaintance, whom we desired to place in safety with us. I told them I had one particular friend, who had escaped to the cathedral, as I conjectured, and promised them a good gratuity on his part, if they saved his life. One of them, accompanied by my servant-maid, went to the church, and called my friend often by name; but it was all in vain, no one answered, and we never heard mention of him from that period.

“ Some moments after our colonel returned, and demanded, whether any person had offered us the least incivility. After we had disculpated

“ the soldiers in this respect, he hastened abroad to see, if there was any “ possibility to extinguish the fire, which had already seized great part “ of the city : he had hardly got into the street, when he returned with “ uncommon hastiness, and said, Shew me the way out of town, for I see “ plainly we shall perish in the flames, if we stay here a few minutes longer.
 “ Upon this we threw the best of our goods and moveables into a “ vaulted cellar, covered the trap-door with earth, and made our escape.
 “ My wife took nothing with her but my robe ; my maid seized a neigh-“ bour’s infant-child by the hand, whom we found crying at his fa“ ther’s door, and led him away. We found it impossible to pass through “ the gates of the town, which were all in a flame, and the streets burnt “ with great fury on either side. In a word, the heat was so intense,
 “ that it was with difficulty we were able to breathe. Having made “ several unsuccessful attempts, we determined at last to make our “ escape on the side of the town next the Elb. The streets were clogged “ with dead bodies, and the groans of the dying were insupportable.
 “ The Walloons and Croats attacked us every moment, but our gene“ rous colonel protected us from their fury. When we gained the basti“ on, which stands on the banks of the Elb, we descended by the scal“ ing ladders, which the Imperialists had made use of in the assault, “ and arrived at length in the enemy’s camp near Rottenfee, thoroughly “ fatigued, and extremely alarmed.

“ The colonel made us enter into his tent, and presented us some re“ freshments. That ceremony being over ; Well, said he, having saved
 “ your lives, what return do you make me ? We told him, that for the pre“ sent we had nothing to bestow, but that we would transfer to him all “ the money and plate that we had buried in the cellar, which was the “ whole of our worldly possessions. At this instant many Imperial “ officers came in, and one chanced to say to me, Ego tibi condoleo, ego “ sum addictus Fidei Augustanæ. The depressed state I found myself in,
 “ made me unable to give a proper reply to the condolences of a man, “ who carried arms against those, whose religion he professed, and whose “ hard fortune he pretended to deplore.

“ Next

1631. “ Next day the colonel sent one of his domestics with my maid-servant to search for the treasure we had buried in the cellar; but they returned without success, because, as the fire still continued, they could not approach the trap-door. In the mean while the colonel made us his guests at his own table, and during our whole stay treated us not as prisoners, but as intimate friends.

“ One day at dinner an officer of the company happened to say, That our sins were the cause of all the evil we suffered, and that God had made use of the catholic army to chastise us: to whom my wife replied, that the observation perhaps was but too true: However, take care, continued she, lest God in the end should throw that very scourge into the flames. This sort of female prophecy was fulfilled soon afterwards on the self same Imperial army, which was almost totally destroyed at the battle of Leipzig *.

“ At length I ventured one day to ask our colonel to give us leave to depart; he complied immediately, upon condition we paid our ransom. Next morning I sent my maid into town to try, if there was any possibility of penetrating into the cellar: she was more fortunate that day, and returned with all our wealth.

“ Having returned our thanks to our deliverer, he immediately ordered a passport to be prepared for us, with permission to retire to whatever place we should think proper, and made us a present of a crown to defray the expence of our journey. This brave Spaniard was colonel of the regiment of Savelli, and named Don Joseph de Ainsa †.”

* There is reason to think our Spanish officer was killed there, for many accounts reckon Savelli (in whose regiment he served as lieutenant colonel) among the dead: but Savelli in truth was then absent, being gone to Vienna in order to be examined concerning the surrender of Damin: and thus the substitute might be confounded with the commander he represented.

† I find Don Joseph de Ainsa only once mentioned in the thirty years wars, and that was in 1625, when Spinelli and he commanded a body of troops of 5000 men, and had a design to attack Mansfelt near Namur. The reader at this time of day may consider our Spanish hero, as no such example and pattern of transcendent generosity; and may be surprized at the gratitude the good pastor shews him in his narrative, and at the expressions of protector, deliverer, &c. And the rather, as the said officer, after all his courtesies, took from him the whole he possessed, if we except liberty and life. But the state of war, and the manners of

Thus ended the siege and storming of Magdeburg; which latter incident may be considered as the most bloody and astonishing transaction, that we can possibly find in modern history. Upon this occasion it, was said of Tilly, with great justice, that most generals, who have enjoyed uninterrupted prosperity in battle, become cruel and vindictive upon the first reverse of good success. For Tilly, long before the surprize of Magdeburg, saw the die of fortune very inclinable to vary to his disadvantage; his temper grew sour and reserved; his natural cheerfulness deserted him. He beheld, with infinite regret, a young, vigilant, intrepid and able adversary, resolved to make a trial of skill in the fight of all Europe against an old man, who was obliged to see with other people's eyes, and commit the execution of the most important actions to inferior commanders: and, finally, what completed his unhappiness was, his troops began to withdraw their confidence and obedience from him; for being glutted with rapine, and fleshed with cruelty, like children over-indulged in vices by a fond parent, they took the liberty to despise that lawful authority, which had a sort of natural right to their services. And here it may be observed, that Cromwell's cruelty at Drogheda was not much inferior to the Imperial barbarity exercised at Magdeburg; and and even Turenne's character will for ever be tarnished by the fatal ir- 1631.

ruption made by him into the Palatinate; in all which cases one cannot help lamenting with the historian, ne tanti facinoris immanitas aut non extitisse, aut non vindicata fuisse videatur.

The siege of Magdeburg being over, which little success on the Austrian side did not deter the states of Holland from subscribing 50,000 guilders a month to the use of Gustavus*, all things were reduced to a new state of confusion between Brandenburg and Sweden:
for the elector, much dismayed at the event, re-demanded the fort of Spandau, (the time stipulated being rendered void by the reduction of the aforesaid city) a place of extreme consequence both to Tilly and the King; since, to all human appearances, the possession of it seemed to determine the fortune of these two contending warriors. His majesty had his own garrison in it, consisting only of 400 men (for fear his neighbours might think him too encroaching on one hand, or too diffident of their sincerity on the other); and from the rights of convenience and urgent necessity, he might have kept the same, and justified his conduct to the public. Less matter would have furnished out a very plausible manifesto; and a timorous or unconscientious person would have seized this opportunity at all hazards, and indulged a certain freedom of fixing his possession therein at every event, especially as the elector of Brandenburg was no less than brother-in-law to the king of Sweden: but Gustavus, determined to observe the strictest rules of honour, knew not how to purchase success (though the fate of his army and his whole military character lay at stake) at the expence of his reputation and good faith. And considering likewise, that his garrison had taken an oath to the elector, which he looked upon as matter of indispensable obligation even in the emergencies of war, he, who had always the gift of deciding in an instant, sent the elector word, by a trumpeter, with an air of anger and disdain (for the mortification he felt was inexpressible), That he was at full liberty to repossess Spandau: but that himself in person would make a visit to Berlin; protesting, in the same breath, that the effusion of innocent blood should not be laid to his charge. At the 1631. heels of this messenger he dispatched count Thurn with more ample orders; commanding him to tell the elector, That the neutrality between them was now understood to cease: and as whatever turned out to the detriment of Sweden and its allies, must consequently prove advantageous to the house of Austria; of course the elector must excuse him, if he occupied passes, took towns, and quartered his troops relatively to his own convenience: for he now made a declaration of hostilities in form, and allowed him only three days to return a definitive answer, without any regard to the future concurrence and co-operation of the court of Dresden.

The elector no ways relished such compendious methods of proceeding; but Tilly's removal into the forest of Hartz (which may be considered as an indiscretion) with a view to terrify the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, lessened the terrors he had conceived of the house of Austria; so, as Arnheim happened to be then at Berlin, he besought the favour of him (as to all appearance, though not in truth so, a disinterested person, and one well known to the public in the character of no common negotiator) to undertake to avert the king's anger, and induce him to enter into some new agreement. Arnheim, (who in fact was sent to Berlin in order to counterwork the Swedish measures) took post-horses, and reached the king forthwith, but could obtain no concessions. His majesty then, conformably to his plan, soon brought matters to a short conclusion; for he marched directly to Berlin at the head of five troops of horse, one thousand commanded musqueteers, and four field-pieces, thinking it most prudent to make use of great force, and a superior degree of compulsion. The astonished elector negotiated three days to very little purpose: at length his comfort* and the exiled mother of the elector Palatin, (who had made Berlin her place of refuge) accompanied by some ladies of distinguished quality, addressing themselves a second time to Gustavus, soon made some impression on his seeming impenetrability, and effected, partly by persuasion and partly by tears, what the men had vainly laboured to bring to a conclusion. In consequence of this application, Spandau was granted to the king during the continuance of the war, the gates of Custrin were ordered to be open to him upon all demands, and the elector was obliged to pay a certain contribution to the Swedish army (amounting to about 3000*l.* a month*) till articles of treaty could be completed in form. Soon afterwards the whole royal army crossed the Spree, and encamped round Berlin †; for the new assignment of Spandau and Custrin determined the king to pass forwards into Saxony, inasmuch as he possessed Spandau in reality, and Custrin in effect; having full power to march southwards (that being his private desire) and little to fear in returning northwards, in case the elector of Saxony should join Tilly, and reduce him to the necessity of retiring nearer towards the Baltic ocean; it being then his intention to carry on a defensive war in the duchies of Mecklenberg, Pomerania and Magdeburg.

Yet the king, in spite of his successes, met with more difficulties and afflictions than one; for the pestilence, which then raged violently in Berlin, made surprizing havock in his camp, which lay near the city walls, insomuch that some regiments lost each of them thirty men in the course of a week. About this time the soldiers too began to grow insolent and rapacious, being much elated with an uninterrupted series of success and prosperity, and took the liberty to plunder some Hamburg and English merchants of a considerable quantity of valuable effects, that were then to be transported (as is most probable) to the ensuing fair at Leipzig. Upon this the king added eighteen new articles, of a more severe nature, to his military code ‡; and compelled his men to restore all the goods unembezzled, and in the state they seized them. Struck with such an high example of justice and humanity, the German traders were soon prevailed upon to lend his majesty a sum (then precisely convenient for the purposes of the war) amounting to something more than 30,000*l.* But the English merchants could not be induced to advance him a single farthing: nevertheless out of respect to their brave countrymen, who then fought under the Swedish ensigns, Gustavus took the opportunity to acknowledge his gratitude, Mean while the general Tilly, besides removing into the forest of Hartz, had committed another oversight on the very day that Magdeburg was taken, which shews, that he wanted spirit to run a hazard, and procured likewise but indifferent intelligence: for not being sure of mastering the town, and fearing upon some false alarm, lest Gustavus should approach him unexpectedly, he destroyed the Dessau-bridge, a pass of great importance †, lying cross the confluence of the Multa and the Elb, consisting of several fortifications, that on the Elb side being extremely large and strong. After his success in storming Magdeburg, he looked back with much affliction on this over timorous precaution ‡, since it excluded him from obstructing the conquests of the Swedes on the other side of that river, and debarred him from the opportunity of approaching to the assistance of the two fluctuating electors, namely, those of Saxony and Brandenburg.

The Imperial general found himself sufficiently exhausted and fatigued with the siege of Magdeburg, which had thinned his army in that respect, where the loss is most considerably felt; for good part of his veteran troops were destroyed. He therefore judged it more convenient to omit sieges of long duration for the future, and decamping from Magdeburg in the end of May, left 5000 men in the town by way of a garrison; and then pointed his course through the country of Hartz, taking Allensleben § and Mansfelt in his way, and entering into conference with several deputies from the free towns and the elector of Saxony, proceeded onwards as far as Erfurt, where the magistracy formed some engagements with him. In his passage through the Hartz, the peasants, in order to be revenged for the cruelties exercised at Magdeburg, killed him such a number of dispersed and straggling soldiers, that the fields adjoining the road were strewn with dead bodies ; so that he lost as many men in this march, as if he had engaged himself in a moderate battle*. At length he turned his thoughts to devise by what means he might deter and terrify the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, who had given more than equivocal indications of having a secret good will to the Swedish cause. Of course he meditated an irruption into that prince's territories ; but a letter from Pappenheim, giving him an account of the king's progress on the banks of the Elb, made him change his plan, and reflect seriously on the conduct of another potentate, of much greater importance in the Germanic system than the landgrave could be : but the letters he sent to the elector of Saxony on the occasion, seemed rather to put him on his guard than dismay him ; for that prince, meerly on account of this epistolary intercourse, raised an army of 20,000 men, and placed Arnheim at their head. The troops were young, healthy and vigorous ; they were well paid and well cloathed ; but wanting the habit of valour, and being destitute of experienced and good subaltern officers, they were hardly able at the battle of Leipzig to look Tilly's hardy and experienced veterans in the face, whose cloaths, as somebody hath remarked, were torn and dirty, but their musquets always clean and bright. Tilly not being able, or not having means to give the elector of Saxony a decisive turn, only hurt himself and the catholic league, by alarming him just so far, as to force him to embrace some salutary measures at so critical a conjuncture. Of this we have a manifest proof ; for the elector by letter soon signified to the emperor, " That the edict

 " of restitution merited well to be re-considered, before it was carried " into full activity : that, by preceding capitulations and Imperial " constitutions, the princes and states of the Germanic body were not " obliged to subsist and re-inforce the emperor's armies : that the pro" testants at Leipzig had only formed an union in contradistinction to " a prior league among the papists, with this difference, that the for" mer proposed to proceed defensively, as the latter had determined to " act the part of aggressors." The court of Vienna understood the import of this letter without an interpreter.

1631. Mean while his majesty having been entertained magnificently in the electoral garden at Berlin (that evening being devoted to extraordinary rejoicings) and having appointed Horn, with an army of 10,000 men, to watch Schomberg's motions, and cover the conquests lately made on the frontiers of Silesia, parted from Berlin at break of day, and making a speedy visit to Stetin, gave audience to Fedor Adreovitzki*, the Muscovite ambassador, who coming from a barbarous part of the world, then less known than at present, astonished the Swedes with half a dozen coaches and six, and a retinue of 150 persons extremely well dressed. With respect to his embassy, one can pronounce nothing distinctly. An offer was made of soldiers and money, and Gustavus appeared to be highly delighted therewith. But the ambassador died in the August following, and the whole proposal and agreement vanished into air †. With the same pestilential fever, in the same month, died the beautiful and virtuous Christina, wife to Gustavus Horn, and daughter of the high chancellor Oxenstiern. She thought it her duty to attend her husband in all his wars: and indeed they were a shining example of reciprocal conjugal happiness and fidelity. She breathed her last breath in the arms of her consort, yet he had the good fortune to escape the contagion; and though young, rich, accomplished, and handsome, yet never could be induced to make choice of a person worthy to replace his deceased wife, whose remains he took care to convey to Sweden in a marble coffin.

As soon as the king had concluded his conference with the Muscovite ambassador, and regaled him at an entertainment full as magnificent as a soldier ought to give, or as times would then admit, he hastened with his usual industry to the camp before Gripswald, which town had been blockaded some months by Banier, and was the only city, that remained to the emperor in all Pomerania. Perusi, a colonel of Croats, knight of the Golden Fleece, commanded in it; he was brave to a degree of gallantry, but the country hated him, for he had the misfortune to be miserably avaricious. Nevertheless his love of military fame ever got the better of his passion for riches, in all such competitions, where the honour of a soldier was concerned: and for this reason, though he had heaped up much wealth in the town, he shewed himself quite inflexible in the article of surrendering, having never once allowed the idea of such a transaction to enter into his thoughts. To relieve the exigencies of his garrison in so long a blockade, he had coined tin-money with this inscription, NECESSITAS GRYPHISWALDENSIS; and had retrieved some old discontinued salt-springs, that lay within the city walls, which proved of great use in preserving provisions for the garrison. Over and above all this, he was an excellent military architect, and had fortified his town so well, that Gustavus (no ill judge in those matters) confessed himself greatly surprized, when he examined the works, having seen nothing amongst his enemies contrived upon the same principle before.

Banier, who had been sent hither to assist Todt, who formed the original blockade, wrote a civil letter to colonel Perusi, insinuating, that he had interest enough with the king his master to procure for him very soldier-like conditions, in case of a capitulation. He exhorted him not to sacrifice a body of brave troops under his command; and represented to him the unchristian depopulations and cruelties, which he had exercised throughout the whole district, that lies round Gripswald*. Perusi's answer was very laconic; that it was not convenient for him to leave the town so suddenly: nevertheless, if permission was given him, he would consult Tilly on the occasion.

Some Swedes, knowing well the governor's appetite for fighting right or wrong, presented themselves in bravado before the walls, and induced him to make a very rash and desperate sally, by means of which, according to the custom of war at that time, he was allured on by degrees into an ambuscade. He was imprudent enough, upon this occasion, to wear his gold chain and order above his armour; which in all probability cost him his life, as every common soldier strove to possess so distinguishing a booty; and from hence most people conclude, that he believed his body, conformably to a report propagated concerning him in both armies, to have been rendered invulnerable by incantations

Though Perusi had the misfortune to be betrayed into an ambuscade, (accompanied by his camerade, a knight of Malta; who fell first) yet he died heroically, and fought with his colours by him to the last gasp, though his Croatian horse, according to custom, had deserted him, and thrown themselves into the river Rick, which divides the beautiful valley of Rosendal into two parts.

Perusi's successor, whoever he was, (though, if I mistake not, he was only a captain, and named Dracksted) made a good shew of resistance: for being required to surrender, he sent word back, that the loss of the late commander was merely personal, and that the honour and resolution of the garrison did not expire sympathetically with him. Nevertheless, after some rencounters, (not to mention a very furious sally, which missed little of succeeding) he thought it prudent to capitulate, and marched out with more military distinctions than are usually allowed in like circumstances: (for the Croats, upon this occasion, as the Swedes greatly wanted to possess Gripswald, were permitted to receive conditions) but as the escort, which conveyed the governor and his soldiers, was not strong enough to prescribe laws to him, for it consisted only of 150 horsemen, he changed his mind on the road, and shaped his course to Havelburg; and not to Rostock, the place agreed upon in the articles of surrender. By way of punishment for this infraction of stipulations, colonel Hall thought it allowable to attack him, and so much the rather, as Banier, under whom he then served, had a particular desire to secure Havelburg, as it helped to

* His body was supposed to be rendered shot-free by mystical words and charms of magic, which the Germans elegantly enough call gefroren, i. e. frozen. He bore the first musquet ball very well, but the second killed him. Honest Lotichius, unwilling to give up the doctrine of incantations, pretends, that Perusi was only gefroren with respect to swords and pikes; for though the ball, saith he, transpierced his body, he expired without bleeding, and only groaned once or twice. De Rebus German. Tom. i. 915.

protect the camp, which his master proposed to fix at Werben. In this rencounter, a considerable number of the German garrison (which was very numerous) lost their lives, particularly Dracksted, who commanded them in chief; and about 1500 soldiers submitted to be disarmed; of whom the greater part enrolled themselves under the Swedish ensigns. Thus the generality of writers recount the story; yet I have some doubts concerning its exactness in one or two particulars, my private conjecture being, that the officer, who commanded the escort (for Hall's action seems to be out of the question) had committed some outrage, which induced the Imperial commander to think, that he might absolve himself from making good the remaining part of the conditions. For had not the fact stood precisely thus, it is not to be comprehended, why the king (though it is certain his mercy always kept pace with his valour) should order general Todt to imprison captain Smith, who commanded the escort, as also all the officers and soldiers, who had been employed in that expedition, with this remarkably severe clause, that they were to be sent to the royal camp either dead or alive! And yet after all this, a new doubt presents itself, for it does not appear, that Smith or any of his soldiers were ever punished; but one historian* tells us, that private notice had been given them of their master's resentment, and that they all absconded till the king had forgotten his anger; who immediately summoned the Imperial officers to appear before him, assuring them, that if any soldier belonging to their garrison had entered into the Swedish service contrary to his real inclinations, he from that moment might consider himself as free, and had leave to depart without ransom: but gentlemen, continued he, if my men have injured you, your complaint must be lodged in my court-martial; for I alone am the legal and competent judge; and you must sign a paper, as cavaliers of honour, not to traduce even in private conversation, by the most distant innuendos, me, or my army in general, merely for the transgression of orders in a few individuals.

But to leave the further discussion of this matter to more enlightened historians (for Chemnitius's † way of solving the difficulty gives me no 1631. content, as it is the assignation of non causa pro causa, except it relates to Smith, and not to Hall,) it may suffice to observe, that the Swedes at length, by possessing Gripswald, had rendered themselves masters of every inch of territory in the duchy of Pomerania; in consequence whereof Gustavus appointed a solemn thanksgiving to God throughout all his dominions*.

It was about this time, that his majesty entertained some fresh suspicions of the king of Denmark, who sent forth a fleet of twenty ships under pretence of guarding his dominions from pirates and invaders: but Gustavus asked such pertinent questions concerning the destination of this naval armament, that his Danish majesty soon promised to be a true and faithful neighbour, in proportion as such conduct was consistent with the allegiance he owed the emperor. True it was, he hated Gustavus, but then he dreaded him likewise: and the report of reinforcements from France, England, Sweden, and Holland quite deterred him from pursuing the resolutions, whatever they might be, which he had first conceived †.

Mean while John-Albert and Adolphus, the two dispossessed dukes of Mecklenberg, who had lived the life of exiles at Lubec, remained not idle; for neither they, nor their subjects, could persuade themselves to acquiesce with common patience under the insolent usurpation of Walstein.

Having gathered together a small army, and united themselves with colonel Todt, who by this time had given the finishing stroke to the reduction of Pomerania, they made themselves masters of several towns and fortresses. At length Gustavus generously co-operated with them in person, so that the new usurper possessed nothing in their territories, except Wismar, Rostock, and Dæmitz. Nevertheless, at the same time it must be observed, that the two first of these places were the largest and fairest towns in the duchy. Dæmitz indeed was only a small fortress, but its situation was fortunate, and its importance great; for (besides commanding the Elb, just where the Elda falls into it) it was possible likewise to float the country all round it, and convey private supplies into it by means of the river first mentioned. 1631.

His Swedish majesty being arrived at Gustrow, which journey he undertook merely to relieve the oppressed, applied himself in good earnest to re-instate the two proscribed princes into their lawful dominions *. As that age loved pomp, the ceremony of their second inauguration was more magnificent than one could imagine to happen in the midst of a profound war. The clergy, the senators, and the nobility (the latter only amounting to the number of 800) began the procession; then succeeded the elder duke, attended by thirty-six halbardiers. To shew his humility, he wore that day a suit of black cloaths. Next came the same number of trumpeters in different liveries. Then followed the king of Sweden on horseback, dressed in green, with a blue and white plumage in his hat, attended by twenty-four running footmen, and eighteen horse-foldiers. Him the junior duke of Mechlenberg marched after, accompanied by the prince of Denmark †, the dukes of Pomerania, and Courland, the princes and princesses of the house of Mechlenberg, and two colonels. The ladies of quality and fashion closed the procession in 130 coaches, guarded by a body of 1800 horsemen, all well mounted and well attired. This cavalcade marched first to the great church, where divine service was performed, and a sermon preached on the following text, They that sow in tears, shall reap in joy: Psalm cxxvi. 5. Departing thence they ranged themselves in the town-hall, where the great-chancellor Oxenstiern made his appearance, and exhorted all the subjects of the duchy to abjure Walstein, and re-acknowledge their natural masters; which request was complied with

* The emperor conferred this duchy on Walstein, together with the duchy of Sagan in Silesia, as a fief, towards the latter end of the year 1628. The Imperial general soon made sure of his investiture, for he dispatched immediately two lawyers, well furnished with edicts and manifestos, and three favourite colonels, namely Aldringer, St. Julian, and Walmrode, to secure his possession. The crime of these unfortunate princes was assisting Christian, king of Denmark. In vain the elder brother made an offer of humiliating himself before the emperor. The court of Vienna had acquired an habitual deafness, and Walstein, to say the least of him, wanted to shine as a second or third rate star in the German hemisphere.

1631. universally and joyfully. Medals were thrown to the populace, which had the heads of the two reigning princes on one side, and a pelican upon the reverse, piercing two human breasts with its beak, and feeding its young ones with streams of blood. Gustavus commanded expressly, that all parents should explain the nature of this restoration to their children, that they might remember, with transports of thankfulness, the restitution of their lawful masters, of their religion, and of their liberty*.

His majesty in the midst of all these rejoicings had his eye constantly fixed on the transactions of the campaign, and having issued out orders for the blockade of Rostock and Wismar, returned without delay to his separate camps, at, and near, New Brandenburg. From thence colonel Bernard Oxenstiern, a relation of the chancellor's, was dispatched in a public character to the French king at Lyons, being privately instructed to see the finishing hand given to the treaty of Berewalt, and solicit the prompt and punctual payment of the contingent subscribed to the German war. This minister was received with great marks of esteem at Lyons, and entertained at the public expence during his whole continuance there, though Curtius, the Imperial resident, in conjunction with an agent sent from Munich, tried to perplex him, and overturn his measures more than once; but all their efforts were unsuccessful. At length being thoroughly baffled, they had the mortification to see all the promises on the part of France fulfilled duly; (for Richelieu as yet had not conceived a jealousy against Gustavus) and Oxenstiern returned with a considerable sum of money, which the court of Versailles had advanced for the support of the protestant cause in Germany.

By the persuasion likewise of Louis XIII, or in consequence of his becoming responsible for other people, the chevalier de Rache was dispatched by Gustavus to the republic of Venice; but the refined and self-interested politicians of that government concluded (not unreasonably) that the scene of war lay at an undue distance from their meridian. They alledged likewise the inability of the state to undertake campaigns, when the pestilence had made such ravage in all the dominions, that belonged unto it; and discovered at the same time a determined unwillingness to engage in such measures, inasmuch as the peace of Italy, far from being perfectly matured, could be considered only in a progressive state of ripening at a distance of time then uncertain. 1631.

Mean while the emperor wrote to all the confederators, who had lately assembled at Leipzig *, requesting them to disband their troops, or unite all in one common alliance, in order to expel Gustavus beyond the very extremities of the empire. He entreated them likewise to grant the Imperial armies free passage, and supply them with provisions, forage, and money: observing that the former licentiousness of his soldiers (supposing that allegation to pass for an uncontroverted truth) could not justify them in undertaking an avowed rebellion against him, who was their sovereign, chieftain, and head; and that their real intention, though concealed under a cloud of pretexts, was literally and truly to elude the edict of restitution, and extort a new religious peace from the catholics. Then followed a mandate directed to all princes, magistrates and commanders of note, enjoining them to issue out no fresh commissions for the enlisting of soldiers; but, on the contrary, to deny passage and quarters to such, as had been lately levied, absolving them by his own plenitude of power from the military oath they had taken to Gustavus and his allies †. The catholic electors wrote one and all to the same effect, and conjured the new associators not to push matters to the extremities of a rebellion.

But these sort of anodynes were not sufficient to compose the uneasinesses among the protestants: on the contrary, they considered them rather as the effects of timidity and despondence in the emperor. The people of Misnia, Franconia and Suabia levied troops with fresh vigour; and the free towns (where manufactures, trade, and arts flourished) exerted themselves with a degree of zeal still more distinguishable. Nettled at so lively an obstinacy, the emperor now began to lose his temper, and ordered Furstenberg, at the head of the army lately arrived from

Mantua,

1631. Mantua, to march directly into the territories of these more exemplary protestants, and destroy all before him with fire and sword. That commander fulfilled his instructions with great rigidity, and soon obliged the towns of Memmingen, Kempten and Ulm, the inhabitants of Franconia, and even the duke of Wirtemberg, to renounce the conclusions of Leipzig: but as these submissions proceeded from fear and compulsion, rather than from a sense of obligation and obedience, they immediately revoked all their promises upon receiving the account of Tilly's defeat in Saxony.

And here perhaps, without being thought to violate the dignity of history, it may be allowed me to introduce the recital of a ridiculous accident, that happened at Hildesheim, which the Imperialists, who were then superstitious to a surprizing degree, interpreted in a manner very inauspicious to their cause. Most people know the low taste of the German drama. The jesuits college in this city exhibited a piece, where two hobby-horse men represented Gustavus and Tilly. The latter gave the former very ill language, and reproached him for his interference in the holy Roman empire. Words, according to the poet's plan, soon matured themselves into action; pistols, laden with powder only, were reciprocally discharged: but unluckily, and against the intention of the dramatist, he, that personated Gustavus, was the better cavalier, and more valorous combatant, for in the heat of his theatrical fury he gave Tilly a violent blow, and unhorsed him. Upon this the house broke up in disorder, and every spectator returned discontented to his respective home, full with indistinct pre-sentiment of what the battle of Leipzig taught him afterwards to realize*.

Nevertheless, some authors recount a similar story with farther circumstances, varying the year, wherein the event happened, and laying the scene at the town of Cham in the Lower Bavaria. It was permitted the children (say they) by the burgomaster, to enroll themselves into two fictitious armies, each boy being left at full liberty to enlist himself under the Imperial or Swedish ensigns; and as the town was truly Bavarian, the Pseudo-Tilly, son to the chief magistrate, soon collected 150 well-looking followers, whereas the mock Gustavus (who had been forced to assume the name by drawing lots) could amass no more than thirty combatants, of smaller stature, and more mean appearance. But the personated king copied his original, in the very shining part of excellency; for having well entrenched his companions in a field adjoining the city, he invited the enemy by sound of trumpet to force his lines. The priests gave a blessing to the Tillian party as they marched from the town, and exhorted them to acquit themselves like warriors of spirit. After repulse upon repulse, they still persevered to lead the children on, till at length the whole corps disunited, and the unconquerable Tilly became a prisoner. On this the young Gustavus commanded his hands to be bound, and having led him to the house of his father, refused to deliver him without a ransom*.

By this time his majesty began to open his grand project of advancing southwards, and having united into one army his several little camps, which lay round Brandenburg, shaped his course towards Saxony, carefully securing and paving his footsteps of his progress as he went along. On this account, with a view to procure more certain intelligence of the enemies motions, he first explored the country at the head of all his cavalry and 1000 commanded musqueteers, as far as the monastery of Jericho, and then to the bridge of Magdeburg city, into which place he forced Pappenheim to retreat for shelter: and finding no indications of any considerable interruption, taking care to leave Oxenstiern behind him with one army in Prussia, and Horn with another in Silesia, he crossed the Elb by fording, and took the town of Tangermund (a place of great importance to him) by affixing a petard to one of the gates. Upon this event the garrison lay at the mercy of the assailants, and such as survived, being about threescore in number, threw themselves in a croud round Gustavus, (for the Swedish soldiers could not yet forget the massacre at Magdeburg) and begged for quarter: which the king granted them in a moment, observing at the same time, That he should not presume to counterwork God's providence, which had preserved them from the resentment of his soldiers by a sort of miracle †. He then flung a bridge of boats over 1631. the Elb, for the convenience of his infantry; but ordered his cavalry and artillery to pass through the river; the bare recital of which act of intrepidity (for nothing was lost, but here and there an empty waggon) amazed Tilly beyond measure, for the stream in that part was not supposed to be fordable.

It was here the king, who loved great strokes in the military way, conceived the idea of astonishing Europe by retaking Magdeburg *, and the rather, as it was thinly garrisoned, and as the fortifications had not been thoroughly repaired since the late disaster. The town likewise lay convenient for him, as it afforded an excellent passage across the Elb, which half determined a campaign in that age, and as his majesty was then circumstanced: and something there was of the illustrious and magnificent in the very action itself. But serious and mature reflexion soon threw a gloom over these dazzling appearances; for Pappenheim was in the town, whom Gustavus considered in the character of a second garrison, though it consisted only of one man;

Atque virum ——— :

Nor was Tilly far off, who lay encamped at Mulhausen; but what he feared most, was allowing the elector of Saxony time to indulge his private disinclination to the Swedish cause, as also his natural timidity and inconstancy. Therefore, making a sacrifice all at once of his ambition, he preferred convenience to glory, and progressive security to fortunate rapidity; which is the more to be wondered at, as the natural turn of his temper was quick and hasty.

Conformably to this cool revision of things, the possession of Havelburg and Werben were considered by him as two excellent preliminary steps: for being encamped at, or near, one of those towns, (the latter indeed was his object of residence, as it lay almost upon the confluent angle of the Elb and the Havel, his back being guarded by both those rivers,) he had the command of the archbishopric of Magdeburg, and the Old March, in front, and on his right hand; and his left side was protected by the Havel, which run through a friendly country; namely, the Middle March. By means of this river, he had power to convey down stream what provisions and forage he thought necessary for the subsistence of his troops. He was environed likewise by rich and plentiful towns: and, what was still more, the post he had chosen was so protected by nature, that though the Imperialists had two armies, one on his right hand in Thuringia, and one on his left hand in Silesia, he feared neither, inasmuch as it was in his power to contest the passage of the rivers, previously to any grand and decisive action.

* Chemnit. de Bello Succ. Germ. Tom. i. 147.

In order to fix himself in this desirable situation, he commanded Banier to take Havelburg by assault, since by possessing that place he became master of the Havel on the eastern side, having secured already the western banks of that river as far upwards as Spandau. The attack was made sword in hand at break of day, and Winkel's blue brigade of infantry not liking the enemy's fire at a distance, crossed the river with astonishing resolution, though the water reached up to the men's shoulders. The action was brisk on both sides whilst it lasted. Four hundred and forty of the garrison were taken prisoners. Colonel Cag was appointed governor, who had under him his own regiment, and Fowle's regiment of Scots. Why Pappenheim left Havelburg a few days before cannot be accounted for, except he considered it as a place indefensible, at least as matters were then circumstanced.

Havelburg being thus secured, his majesty, conformably to his original plan, employed two good officers; namely, Bauditzen and count Ortemberg, to take the town of Werben sword in hand, who carried their point, after having met with a very obstinate resistance, killing and making prisoners 200 horsemen belonging to the regiment of Munick-haufen. As the dispute had continued long, and the weather proved then extremely warm (it being the last day of June) these two commanders thought proper to bathe themselves in the Elb, and then crowned the performance with an over-free indulgence in Baccharah-wine. Of course they both fell into violent fevers; the former escaped by the skill of his physician, or the dint of constitution; but the latter expired soon afterwards at Berlin, to the great regret of Gustavus, who loved him extremely for his abilities in the cabinet, as also for his 1631. courageous and enterprising disposition. He commanded the royal regiment of foot-guards.

By this time the Imperial general found himself obliged to give some check, if possible, to the progresses made by Gustavus on the banks of the Elb, and having dropped his enterprize against the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, advanced as far as Wolmerstadt, a small town ten miles north-west of Magdeburg, and about forty miles from the Swedish camp. Mean while the van-guard of his army, consisting of four chosen regiments * (the very flower of the Imperial cavalry) had advanced a considerable way before their general, which Gustavus being apprized of, immediately conceived the thought of giving them a camifado in an evening or two, for he never failed of procuring the best intelligence. To this purpose he ordered 2500 chosen troops, horse, dragoons, and musqueteers, to assemble themselves at Arnberg in the Old March, and at nine at night joined them privately, and conducted them to a village four miles beyond Tangermund. Nevertheless, whatever secrecy this expedition might require, as the next day proved to be Sunday, and as the enemy's advanced troops happened to be stationed at sixteen miles distance, the king chose to lie by privately, and set apart a certain number of hours for the service of religion; dispatching the watch-master general of the army with the royal regiment of horse-guards to procure intelligence. This officer returned about five in the evening with several prisoners, who gave information, that the Imperialists had taken up their quarters within the distance of two hours easy marching.

They were conducted by colonel Bernstein, a brave and enterprising commander, who took up his lodgings at three different villages, at a slight inconsiderable distance one from the other: and as these places happened to lie upon a line, the Swedish party divided itself into three bodies, it being their intention to cut off all communication between the Imperial regiments at the right and left, the very instant the attack was begun.

* Pappenheim, Montecucoli, Holk, and Coronini.

At the point of time agreed, one body of Swedes gave a furious onset on the regiment of Montecuculi *, which was partly routed and partly cut to pieces, before the men could mount on horseback, and range themselves in any tolerable order. But as no concerted attacks can well commence at a precise moment, Bernstein heard the explosion of the first fire-arms, and having caused his men to mount immediately, made a judicious disposition of the better half of them, and at the head of one troop of his cavalry, marched to the entrance of the village, and gallantly received the enemy; but the impression was so violent, the Swedish troops being prepared and fresh, and Bernstein's men both hurried and fatigued, that after a very brisk and obstinate contest, the latter soon broke and began to shift for themselves. The chance of escaping under favour of darkness is a great temptation to soldiers thus attacked, to behave themselves ill; especially when in such confusion it is morally impossible to distinguish particular offenders: consequently the advantage is at least two to one in behalf of the assailants, who have fixed their resolution and advance determined. Be that as it will, Bernstein stayed till the very last man, and was killed probably without being known. In him perished a family, for he had no kindred. He was an officer of approved service, or otherwise Pappenhiem would not have allowed him to have conducted his own regiment of cuirassiers, and a body of troops, that appertained properly to his army.

Mean while Holk † made a resistance, which appears incredible; for during the other attacks he had leisure-minutes to draw out his men.

† Holk, Henry, served the king of Denmark as governor of Stralsund, but on some disgust accepted of a regiment of infantry under Wallstein. It was thought matter of levity in him to espouse a young wife, at the time when the town he defended was reduced to the utmost danger. He gained immense wealth in the plunder of Leipzig. As to his religion, he changed it twice, for on his death-bed, being seized with the plague, he declared himself a protestant, and dispatching round the country several troops of horse, offered 100 l. for the charitable assistance of a Lutheran minister in his last hours; but he had committed such outrages, that no ecclesiastic would come near him till it was too late; and though he was at the head of an army of 10,000 men, all his officers and domestics deserted him, excepting a young woman, whom some supposed to be his mistress. In the Imperial patent, by virtue of which he was created a count, his name is spelt Holka.

1631. He received the Rhingrave unmoved, and disputed the honour of the field inch by inch. In this tumult he had the unhappiness to lose two pair of colours, on one of which was depicted the goddess Fortune, and the word AUDACTER inscribed beneath; but the other was still more elegant, and more particular both as to its emblem and motto; for a serpent wreathed in spires rolled itself round a drawn sword, (alluding to the wisdom of the animal, and the bravery, which the weapon implied,) and the device was, HIS DUCIBUS, SITIS IMPERTERRITI.

His majesty, for fear the soldiers might quit their ranks in quest of plunder, gave private orders to set the villages on fire: for if the men had deserted their station in hopes of booty, a detachment from the enemy's camp, part of which lay hard by, might have robbed the Swedes of a considerable victory. Yet much plate was found, and a private soldier seized one thousand pounds in Hungarian ducats. Abundance of excellent horses fell likewise into the hands of the conquerors*.

His majesty commanded personally in this engagement, but where or how far cannot be learned. Nevertheless, as the post of importance was attacking the middle village, and cutting off the communication, it is natural to think, that he fell upon Bernstein's quarters †. He was extremely afflicted at the death of Charles, prince Palatin of Lautrech ‡, his own sister's son, who received two pistol-balls in that obstinate resistance, which Holk made. He fought at the head of the Rhingrave's regiment, and a few moments before his death had killed a cornet of the enemy's hand to hand; but the cornet's camerade, (as most officers in that age had a gentleman-volunteer, who served with them under that title) soon revenged his friend, according to the manner above related. His corpse was carried to Stein, where the queen of Sweden, of whose arrival in the empire we shall speak immediately, thought fit to honour it with a most magnificent funeral.

* Anilabæi Arma Suecica, p. 173.

† Since my writing this passage, I find the conjecture verified. Rex cum suis, in Rheindorfium, Bernsteinianæ legionis hospitium, impegit, &c. Lotichius, Tom. i. 720.

‡ That branch of the Palatin family became extinct in the year 1694. It had three little possessions, the duchy of Veldentz, the town of Lautrech, (which now belongs to the elector Palatin) and the county of Lutzellstein; which at present is divided between the houses of Birckenfeld and Sultzbach.

It must be observed, that this victory at Rheindorf or Angern (such being the names of the principal, villages where the Imperialists lay) was chiefly gained by the means of the intermingled musqueteers, and by the assistance of small parties of them, who filled up the avenues, where horsemen could not well be stationed. Fifteen hundred men were killed, and twenty eight colours taken, Tilly being advanced almost within hearing the discharge of the fire-arms; which mortified him not a little.

This action, not to mention the gallantry thereof, did the king great service; for it astonished the Imperialists to such a degree, that he gained four days to make additions to the intrenchments and fortifications round his camp at Werben; for which labour he was afterwards repaid with abundant interest. He procured opportunity likewise to draft all the neighbouring garrisons, and summon to his assistance several scattered regiments, that lay near him; so that in truth (and thus it often happens in the conduct of great generals) the little action at Rheindorf facilitated the prudent encampment made at Werben, and both together paved the way to that more important decision, which happened at Leipzig, which completed the operations of the year 1631. For all good campaigns, if rightly analyzed and duly explained, are nothing less than one continued series of judicious causes, and fortunate effects*.

One cannot sufficiently admire the king's great military judgment, in fixing his camp precisely on that spot, which he had long wished to occupy: for having thrown a bridge of boats over the Elb, he had it in his power at one and the same time to attack either the Imperialists, or the elector of Saxony, who could not well conclude a treaty at such a distance and under such circumstances; nor could Tilly advance without giving Gustavus the choice of a battle. I have before observed, that the camp of Werben could not possibly be distressed for want of provi-

* I remember in my youth to have heard the great earl of Peterborow make a very lively comparison upon the occasion: "Pope" said he, (for Mr. Pope was then sitting at table) "always fixes first on the last rhyme of his couplet, and the general cast of the second line: and thus, (continued he) a good commander, at the very dawning of a campaign, should pre-figure to himself by what action he proposes to conclude it; for the last stroke always computes for something in the year ensuing."

1631. fions and forage, and shall remark here, that it had two the best natural fosses behind it, that a general could wish for, namely, the Elb, and the Havel. These rivers protected likewise its flanks: and as to the front, it was guarded one part in three by the town of Werben, which was fortified; so that a small tract of ground only required the assistance of art, and that the king strengthened by deep intrenchments, disposing large batteries of cannon here and there. In this situation he commanded not only the Elb and the Havel, but had an eye likewise to the Oder and the Warta; so that within the great expansion of command, the whole electorale of Brandenburg lay directly under his protection*.

During these occurrences, Maria Eleonora, queen of Sweden †, like a consort worthy of the hero she had espoused, left the pleasures of the court of Stockholm, in order to alleviate the fatigue and cares of her husband, and brought with her a re-inforcement of 8000 men, half of whom joined the grand army, and the other half was employed in the service of the dukes of Mechlenburg, with a view to facilitate the conquests of Rostock and Wismar. This lady, who was a pattern of conjugal affection, had her share likewise of resolution and magnanimity: for instantly on her embarkation for Sweden, one large ship, furnamed the VASA, laden with heavy artillery and military stores, in a day entirely calm, at about two miles distance from shore, sunk directly to the bottom, without giving any previous warning, and never striking upon shelf or rock. The sudden unaccountable loss of a vessel, that bore such an illustrious family-name, might have terrified a poor woman, especially in an age so unfortunately ingenious in expounding omens and prodigies: but the queen heroically pursued her course; nor did she balance a moment between female fears, and the assistance, that was due to the great Gustavus ‡.

On her arrival at Wolgast, where she made some short stay, (for the duke of Pomerania had sent his deputies to see her well entertained, and her husband had taken care to destine a palace for her reception) she was agreeably surprized with the celebration of a public thanksgiving throughout all Pomerania, on account of the revolution of an entire year since the landing of Gustavus in those parts; and about the same time, by way of counter-check for the satisfaction she felt, her tenderness was alarmed and put to the trial; for it was indiscreetly told her by some of her courtiers, that a jesuit, disguised in the habit of a cavalier, had been discovered by Bauditzen. It was confirmed too, that he had three more companions of his order, and had a design probably to assassinate the king. 1631.

Mean while Tilly, touched to the heart with the late disgrace his troops had received at Angern, wished most ardently to repay the Swedes in like manner; and the rather, as he found himself still at the head of 24,000 soldiers, who breathed nothing but revenge and fury. It was time likewise to perform something of the astonishing kind; all Europe expected an action of this nature, and his very soldiers demanded it. In addition to this it must be observed, that Pappenheim had persuaded him to crush the king of Sweden first, and then reduce the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel to reason at some more convenient opportunity. He therefore marched his army in full battle-array up to the Swedish lines, and made his enemy the offer of an engagement upon equal terms: but the king, who never transgressed military prudence, when the welfare of the system was concerned, and who husbanded the lives of his officers and soldiers, though he dealt something unsparingly now and then with his own person, chose rather to confide in his intrenchments, and gave Tilly the choice of running, if he pleased, upon his own destruction; which he hoped might happen from the extraordinary ardour of Pappenheim. Besides his grand object was, first to fix a firm alliance with the two protestant electors, and then give battle whenever a favourable opportunity presented itself. What he thus wisely foresaw, was very soon realized; for Tilly being determined to make one trial of skill, led his troops up to the front of the king's camp at Werben, which, according to a plan * I have seen of it, was completely fortified by art

* One thing is remarkable in this plan; the king's tent was erected in a large area, defended with a ditch and parapet, almost in the center of his camp. Some general officers had their tents likewise in the same enclosure; but whether this was his majesty's constant practice I cannot say.

1631. and nature, being something in the shape of a bow, protected on the strait side by the town of Werben (which had walls and outworks) as also by strong redoubts and ditches; and guarded on the elliptical part by the river Elb, and part of the Havel.

When Tilly brought his greater artillery to act, the cannonading was desperate on both sides. From one battery of thirty two pieces, he pierced through the king's camp in such a manner, that the major part of the troops was obliged to draw up in battle array behind the walls of Werben. Yet the king, who only opposed the Imperialists with half the number of forces that they had, (for his whole army amounted to little more than 12,000 men) never lost his vivacity and presence of mind for a single moment: nor did he call in his advanced guards of cavalry and musqueteers, relieving them only at proper intervals of time, and giving each and all the officers at parting these particular instructions, namely, to retreat inch by inch, in case the Imperialists should overpower them by numbers, but never to turn their backs to the enemy.

Wearied out and chagrined with indecisive skirmishes, Tilly at length determined to force the king's lines: and though this general had dealt too long in realities to rely greatly upon visionary expectances, yet on this occasion he had amused himself with the hope of corrupting some peasants to nail the Swedish cannon, and set fire to their camp in sundry places, just before the grand attack should begin. But it was not easy, even by the most clandestine correspondence, to frustrate the vigilance of Gustavus, who upon this and all occasions had the presence of mind to turn to his own advantage those very incidents, that were calculated to distress him; for having discovered both the conspiracy and the conspirators, (one of them, for what motive I know not, making full confession of the fact) he ordered fires to be kindled in various parts of his camp, and instructed the rabble of the army to imitate confusion and noises of perplexity. What is more remarkable, he imparted the discovery of this treachery to no one of his generals*, but allowed his assailants to approach the very mouth of his cannon, without returning any fire excepting that of his musqueteers. Then, in an instant, broke forth a terrible discharge of grape-shot; the consequences of which, far from being described, cannot well be imagined. It is true, the Imperialists advanced with determined resolution and an air of confidence; but after this unexpected and terrible reception, it was impossible for their commanders to restore the ranks, or bring the men on to action a second time. In this chaos of confusion and dismay, some Swedish troops, conducted by Bauditzen and the Rhingrave, passed the lines, and fell upon the enemy's rear with great resolution; but Tilly, with equal bravery and capacity, made his soldiers halt, and having brought his artillery to act, soon convinced the assailants, that every retreat was not a flight. Thus for once he escaped a disgrace, which might have proved as afflicting, as that which befel him afterwards on the plains of Leipzig. The conflict was extremely sharp and obstinate. Bauditzen, in the transports of courage, mixed so far among the enemy's troops without reflexion, that at length he was taken prisoner by two horsemen; but young Wildestein, a youth of quality (for in point of years he hardly merited the name of a man) who served under him in the capacity of a volunteer, soon rescued his general, who fought his way back with unparalleled resolution; and having killed an Imperial commander of note, brought little more than the haft of his sword out of his body. His good fortune, all things considered, was very particular, for he escaped without a wound; yet two balls carried away the pommel of his saddle, and the rowel of one of his spurs, and his horse was shot in four places. Here Bernard, duke of Saxon Weymar*, gave the first distinguishing marks of that military genius, which procured

* This gallant prince inherited an irreconcilable hatred to the house of Austria, being descended from that elector of Saxony, who was taken prisoner at the battle of Muhlberg, and deprived of his electorate and the greater part of his other possessions. Anhalt, was left a widow in his infancy, yet gave him, and all her children, a most accomplished education. This last action, the siege of Brisac, may be considered as one of the finest military performances of that age; for he won four pitched battles, whilst he invested the town; and sent the four Imperial generals, namely, John de Wert, the duke Savelli, Furstenberg, and Sperräuter, prisoners into France. In the last of these engagements, he was obliged to mount six different horses; and one being dazzled with a pistol, that was fired close to his eyes, reared up and fell backwards upon his rider; but the troops formed themselves round their general to such a degree, that it was impossible for the enemy to take him prisoner. Afterwards, John de Wert and he singled out each other, and maintained a combat hand to hand with so much bravery and obstinacy, that the troops for a short time paused, as it were, by consent, to observe the behaviour of two such distinguished warriors.

When he took Brisac, and chose not to assign it, by way of depositum, into French hands, his answer to Richelieu was very noble: ask a virgin to make a sacrifice of her chastity? Upon this, the cardinal lost all patience, and observed decorum and management no longer. One remonstrated against the advancement of money, and one urged the quantum meruit of the performance. Great proposals were made the duke, if he would come to Paris; but he saw the net that was spread for him, and refused peremptorily to undertake the journey. He knew the court of Versailles, and that court had known him before this period; for he did not chuse, in the year 1636, to give precedence to Richelieu: and when he had his audience from the king, well considering what honours were due to his birth, as prince of the house of Saxony, and supposed to descend, by the Misnian branch, from the race Imperial, he thought proper to rank himself on the same footing, upon which the French had lately placed the duke of Parma. (Memoires touchant les Ambassadeurs Tom. 1. p. 122.) This event was foreseen and dreaded; but the ministry did not care to found his sentiments upon that topic, for fear of suggesting an idea to him, which perhaps had not then found an entrance into his imagination. Trusting therefore to pure chance, they thought it safest to allow him admission without any previous discussion of difficulties. Of course, the moment the king covered himself, he, with great composure, put on his hat: upon this, the court was struck dumb with astonishment; but there was no room at that time for open resentment, since France needed more the duke's assistance, than the duke wanted her's.

Upon occasions of a like nature, there were some misunderstandings too between him and Oxenstiern, to whom, after the king's death, he gave the lead with great reluctance; and it was in consequence of that unfortunate competition, that he threw himself into the arms of France.

This heroic prince died in 1639, in the thirty sixth year of his age, having waged war against the emperor just half that time. Upon the approach of death he made his will, performed all the duties of a good Christian, and pronounced a dying speech to his officers on the subject of expiations, avarice and military jealousies. These brave men all shed tears on the occasion. It was thought about that time he was entering into some negotiation with the emperor; but it is more probable, as I have observed fully in another place, that he was attempting to carry on the grand project of marrying the unparalleled Amelia, landgrave's of Hesse-Cassel, who had just then quitted her weeds of widow-hood; which alarmed the French minister beyond all description. He complained of a fish-sauce he had eaten. And if there be any thing dishonourable in that circumstance, it must be attributed to Richelieu. His body was full of livid spots, which some physicians called the plague: the reader must take that part of the probability, which agrees best with his judgment. He bequeathed Raven, a poor miller's horse he always fought upon, to count Nassau, and his sword to Guébriant: he left colonel Ohem 3000 l. and then devised to Nassau, Rofa, and Erlach, 2000 l. each, 800 l. to his chaplain, and something considerable to all his friends and domestics. He constituted the four colonels above mentioned commanders of his army provisionally, till France and Sweden should agree upon a proper general; commanders, I say, of that very army, which Richelieu, by the means of Erlach, seduced into the French interests; as he did also, the town and garrison a second was forced to quit him, as that too was grievously wounded. 1631.

The king, who had the quickest eye to merit of any prince or general upon earth, gave him orders immediately to raise three regiments, and repair to the assistance of the landgrave of Hesse; yet gently reprimanded both him and Bauditzen, partly for acting without orders, and partly for exposing their persons with too much freedom. Happy, could he have practised himself what he taught others with so much affection, and such great clearness of reason!

Tilly now began to feel the manifest superiority of Gustavus, and discovered at length, that it was equally in his power (I will not say in his choice) to act the offensive or defensive part; being composed and phlegmatic, vigorous and operative, precisely as such conduct best agreed with his present situation. He learned moreover, by bitter experience, after having served upwards of fifty campaigns, and gained no less than six and thirty battles, that a superior genius, with an army not half equal in number to that of the assailants, cannot be compelled into a decisive action, except he chuses to embrace the offer. But besides all this, it was manifest to Tilly, even in his own judgment, that the king greatly exceeded him in the methods of subsisting an army, in the arts of entrenchment, and in the management of his artillery; and for these reasons bent his thoughts from this moment to allure him to an engagement on plain ground. Conformably to this plan, he afterwards sent him a romantic sort of a challenge, and desired to have the honour to dispute the fate of the empire with him in open field, drawing up his troops in fair battle-array at half a mile distance from the Swedish lines; but the king was reserved, and checked his natural ardour with great command of temper, for he expected Horn and Todt to join him with a re-inforcement of 14,000 men, drawn from the garrisons of Pomerania and Brandenburg.

garrison of Brisac. He bestowed on every other colonel that served under him, 1000 l. and having ordered the soldiers to take an oath to their new leaders, bequeathed to each man a month's pay, which made upon the whole a sum not much less than 20,000 l. Thomæ Carr, Tippetanensis, Itinerarium. Tom. xi. cap. 40.

It is certain, that M. de Turenne always acknowledged the duke de Weymar to have been his preceptor in the art of war: and the prince de Condé professed the same obligations to another disciple of Gustavus, namely, Gassion. Mémoires de la Farre, p. 23, 24.

1631. Mean while, Tilly, correcting his judgment at the expence of losing 6000 men, the very flower of the Imperial army, in the two actions last recited, gave over, for the future, all thoughts of forcing his Swedish majesty's intrenchments, and waited with impatience for the reinforcements, that were ready to power upon him from all parts, in order to give the decisive stroke at once, expecting success from some fortunate unforeseen event, or hoping by the dexterity of his marches, and the frequency of shifting from place to place, to surprize his majesty unprepared, and upon equal ground. For these reasons, and partly for want of provisions to support his army (whilst Gustavus drew food and forage in great plenty from the district round Havelburg, not to mention the actual arrival of Horn and Todt) he marched directly to Halle, with an intention to take Leipzig, and compel the elector of Saxony to abjure the cause of Sweden. But the king sagaciously penetrated into these designs, and having passed the Elb at Wittenberg, joined the Saxons, as will appear hereafter; whilst general Banier kept all open behind him, even to the Baltic ocean. Upon this, Tilly retired to Tangermund, and from thence to Magdeburg: and the king, not contenting himself to continue idle a single moment, requested the states general of the United Provinces, by letter, not to discharge their troops then in pay, but on the contrary exhorted them, to maintain them for the safety of the continent a little longer, or consign them to him*.

And now, that we may not violate the connexion of our subject, we will resume our narrative for a short space backwards, taking notice of the expedition of the marquis of Hamilton from England, and concluding that piece of British history once for all, though it reaches till the middle of the month of September in the ensuing year. And though perhaps I may disagree with bishop Burnet † in various places, yet I shall express myself with the same candour, as if the author were now living, and had the opportunity of perusing these papers; since it is impossible to be too guarded, or too modest, when one reviews the performances of a writer, who can no longer justify himself. The marquis of Hamilton had the honour to be allied to the royal family, and was so much esteemed by the queen of Bohemia for an attachment to her interests, and a certain heroic gallantry in his disposition, that she treated him as a kinsman, an adviser, and a friend. But Charles I. had not spirit enough, to levy and transport abroad a body of troops openly and avowedly for the restitution of the Palatinate: of course he supplied the marquis with money, and the means of raising money underhand; and desired, indiscreetly enough, that Europe should consider him as a person removed entirely out of the question. This method of proceeding seems to me to have arisen purely from timidity and irresolution, even though it gives a contradiction to that unhappy prince's past conduct: for certain it is, that he sent Sir Thomas Roe ambassador to Gustavus merely upon the subject of the German invasion, which said public minister continued at Stockholm till the month of June 1630*. As he was a man of parts and spirit, he greatly relished a Swedish expedition into Germany, and upon all occasions informed his court, that Gustavus was an intrepid and judicious commander; one, who sustained in his own person all the offices of soldier and statesman, being (to use his own words) Vir ad magnas res & revolutiones natus †.

He represents farther, with no small uneasiness, the strong necessity of supplying Gustavus with no inconsiderable sums of money, in order to determine him to undertake the invasion, which at that time employed his thoughts, and appears much discontented lest De Charnacé should ‡ conclude an agreement between France and Sweden, and rob England of an honour, which appertained more properly to her.

That Sir Thomas comprehended fully the true part he was to act, may be inferred not only from the jealousy he conceived against De Charnacé, (who performed that for France, which our countryman wished to effect in behalf of his own nation) but from the regard Gustavus had for him, who honoured him with a present amounting to 1631. the value of two thousand five hundred pounds, esteeming him doubtless as the promoter and encourager of the German expedition *. This present was accompanied with a letter from Oxenstiern, wherein are to be found these remarkable words ; Quæ inter nos mutuis colloquiis ac discursibus acta sunt ratione belli à S. R. majestate, domino meo clementissimo, in Germaniam transferendi ; cujus auctor & impulsor illustritas vestra NOMINE serenissimi regis sui strenuus extitit.

Nevertheless, whatever commission his Britannic majesty might give Sir Thomas, it is plain, that minister (as such instructions were conformable to his own sense of things) promoted their taking effect with so much sincerity and vigour, that the king his master was startled, when he began to think of realizing them in good earnest. By way of expedient therefore to get clear from such bold and enterprizing measures, he allowed himself (as indeed he had done at intervals for two years before) to be amused by his enemies, almost as much as his father had been, and lent a listening ear alternately to the illusory promises of the Austrians and Spaniards ; and this, notwithstanding the steps he had taken to persuade Gustavus to interpose in the empire, who, to do him justice, laid open his whole plan to Charles, and pressed effectual, (not superficial) assistances from England in the strongest manner, partly by the applications of the elector Palatin, and partly by the representations † of Spence, his ambassador, and Curtius, his resident.

His Britannic majesty in the second place had great expectances from the negotiations of Sir Robert Anstruther, who, conformably to this new-invented plan, was dispatched to the diet of Ratibon, and laboured to bring to bear the restitution of the Palatinate in an amicable manner, at the very moment when Gustavus first set his foot in Germany ; and to give a new turn to the ill successes, which attended that minister. Sir Henry Vane was deputed ambassador extraordinary to the king of Sweden, and landed at Hamburg in the month of October 1631, some few weeks after the battle of Leipzig. This gentleman was considered as a more proper political implement to work with at that time, and on the system then adopted, than Roe appeared to be : nor did Vane obtain his new employment, but by the old court-trick of undermining his predecessor, who, in a letter to the queen of Bohemia, explains the whole mystery, and gives vent to his just resentments in that sort of language, which usually occurs to an honest man, who thinks himself supplanted. He calls Sir Henry Vane “ a bold undertaker,” though I know, continues he, “ he cannot build upon my foundations. This blow came from Vienna upon new pretences, “ That the prosperity of the king of Sweden would make our treaty easy, “ if a man were employed, that would advance peace, to which I was “ esteemed an enemy.—I have honour enough in the sincerity of my “ negotiations, and that God had blessed them, and made me one instrument ; though I boasted not, until another would take my honour of bringing the brave king into Germany, which I had rather have inscribed on my tomb, than titles dearly bought at the loss of honour *.” And some months before this, he wrote to my lord Dorchester in the following words ; “ I “ have received the enclosed from the chancellor of Sweden, wherein “ I have honour enough done me, that I was the agent to bring that “ brave king into Germany †.”

At length his Britannic majesty, amused by restless shiftings to and fro, but not relieved, gave the marquis of Hamilton private instructions to levy a body of troops, and conduct them into Germany. Upon this the Scottish nobleman dispatched colonel Alexander Hamilton †, (Chemnitz gives him that Christian name) brother to the earl of Hadinton, to the king of Sweden, and employed afterwards David Ramsay on the same errand the May following. Gustavus took the proposal in good part, and conveyed back immediately his own limitations and conditions of acceptance, of which (if I am allowed only to remark, with the above-cited historian §, that the king reserved to himself the supreme power of command) the more material substance was as follows ; “ That 1631. “ as the marquis had generously proposed to raise 6000 men at his own “ expence, to be employed against the Imperialists, and any other ene“ mies of Sweden, it was highly proper, by way of preliminary, that the “ intended place of landing should be first specified; that 4000 infantry “ should conduct him to the Swedish army, or wherever his troops were “ to make an impression; and that this escort was to be paid one whole “ year at the Swedish expence; that as the marquis supposes 2000 horse “ absolutely necessary for the protection of his infantry, expedients “ should be sought for, to procure such a number of cavalry; that the “ marquis shall not only have full command over this army in the “ king’s absence, but a counsellor shall be added to him, in order to render “ his deliberations more expeditious, and less liable to objections: whatever “ the marquis conquers shall belong to Sweden, but the emoluments and “ contributions shall appertain to him and his army; provided, at the “ same time, that no outrages or extortions be committed. Lastly, the

 “ Sweden *.”

I have never seen the marquis’s original proposals, which produced these conditions and limitations on the part of his Swedish majesty; but there is a spirit in the latter, and a political ability, which shew Gustavus considered not himself in the situation of a suppliant prince. Not one syllable is mentioned in regard to the Palatinate, the only true and ostensible object of Great-Britain’s interference. Nevertheless, it is probable, notwithstanding all that Burnet insinuates to the contrary, that the promise of an escort, and the co-operation of 4000 men in Swedish pay, was always intended (as will appear more fully by and by) because it was afterwards realized, which the bishop alloweth not. But as to the clause relating to the addition of 2000 cavalry to the marquis’s infantry, it is conceived in such vague and indeterminate expressions, namely, that, upon condition they should be found necessary, expedients shall be sought for to procure them; that it appears to me, (and ought so then to have been understood) as a sort of offer merely eventual, which the king intended to fulfil, or omit, as best agreed with the exigencies of war. The joining of a counsellor (who probably was a man of the sword,) with the marquis is a plain proof too, that it was never proposed, that the British general should have the supreme command: And that no conquests should belong to him, or the parties whose cause he more immediately espoused, was a farther proof, that no operations of his could have any effect in procuring the recovery of the Palatinate. The last article, that of taking the oath of fidelity to the crown of Sweden, proves the least exceptionable of any one, that is to be found in the whole collection; yet even that gave some additional weight to his majesty's power: nor is it usually insisted upon, when a lesser allied army co-operates with a larger body of troops: yet in this case Gustavus asked no more than he granted himself in relation to the garrison, which he placed in Spandau.

In the body of the treaty, I passed over a circumstance, which at that moment seemed too minute for an history of consequence; but because in the course of making these remarks one cannot but be struck with the independent spirit, and superior air of authority in Gustavus, (not to mention the promptness and firmness of his mind, even at a time when he was greatly distressed, and requesting a favour) I must here just observe, that though the king had promised the marquis bills of exchange to buy ammunition, and had also agreed to provide him with a great number of musquets, pikes and cannon-balls, and a certain quantity of iron and utensils to make some warlike instruments of that nobleman's own invention; yet in the same paragraph it was also stipulated, that if the treaty then agitating at Dantzic between the Swedes and Imperialists should take effect, and a general peace be concluded, the marquis should refund to his majesty the particular sums of money, that had been expended upon these military instruments by way of preparation. Be that as it will, Gustavus chose to prescribe laws, and not receive them: and as he perceived the king of England wanted magnanimity to appear as he ought in so glorious a cause, he therefore chose either to make him subservient, or not depend on him at all, there being no other alternative in the transaction of an affair so critical with an irresolute monarch.

1631. The March following, in the year 1631, the marquis at length, with the concurrence of the king his master, accepted of the above mentioned proposals, and engaged to land his troops at the place stipulated in the month of June next ensuing *. He commented a little upon here and there an article, and made a few slight explanations and enlargements upon several passages, to which no answer was returned, so far as I can discover at this distance of time: but nothing systematical was advanced upon the whole, nor any one objection duly urged against those various clauses, which I have made my observations upon, as carrying with them the marks not only of great ability, but of superior commanding authority in Gustavus. Nevertheless, this omission must be referred to the king and his ministry, as in truth it ought, and not to the marquis of Hamilton.

Donald, lord Rea (whose family name was Mackay) and David Ramsay, who both served in the Swedish army, were now employed by Gustavus in Great-Britain to facilitate the turn of affairs in his behalf, and encourage the new general in raising recruits; and on this account (in respect to some words spoken of the marquis) arose that noted quarrel between them, which ended in an appeal to single combat, authorised by a royal commission †, concerning which all our historians express themselves with so much minuteness, that I shall purposely pass it by without further notice. It is true bishop Burnet gives them both

* He left England July 16, touched at Oresund, and landed at Wolgast the second and third of August.

† At the day of trial, Ramsay called Rea liar, and barbarous villain, and, throwing down his glove, protested, to gar him dy for what he had said, if he had him in a place for that purpose. But Rea preserved an intire dominion over his temper, and replied only, without signs of passion and discomposure, Mr. Ramsay, we will not contend here; answer my bill. Sanderson's History of England, p. 167.

Upon the whole, it was improbable that Rea should want to attach himself to the marquis any further than out of pure affection to a nobleman of his own country, for he knew the king of Sweden would never allow Hamilton a separate command, and he had better employments under Gustavus (being a colonel of two regiments) than he could hope to obtain in the British army. So that if there was any treason at bottom, (which I no ways suspect) it certainly lies at Ramsay's door.

The dress of the appellant and defendant on the day of trial was very conformable to the taste of chivalry at that time. Ramsay was clothed in scarlet, laced with silver so thick, that the ground of the cloth could hardly be seen. The lining was a sky-coloured plush. Lord Rea was apparelled in black velvet with silver trimmings and buttons, his sword hung in a silver-embroidered belt; and he wore the order of a Scottish baronet about his neck. Ibid.

extremely bad characters, which representation at this distance of time it is not in my power to contradict. All I know of them is, they were soldiers of approved services, and Gustavus valued them both, especially the former; a circumstance many people will think sufficient to confront an hearsay report, delivered down to us by a very able, but prejudiced historian, who paints with great warmth, and snatching one point of view finishes his portrait, without consulting what particular lights and attitudes the subject may admit of.

In the spring-months of the year 1631, Hamilton employed himself with great diligence to collect an army; and the cause in itself was so agreeable to the people of England and Scotland, that his drums soon drew together a considerable number of troops, and many experienced officers flocked to him both from Holland and the Low-Countries. He then dispatched an agent, saith Burnet, to beseech Gustavus to order the escort of 4000 men to be ready to join him on his first landing in Germany; and, in case such a body of forces could not be spared, to send him letters of exchange, whereby he might be enabled to levy the afore-said number of men.

On the other hand, as matters now drew near their crisis in the empire, (for the generals knew by the interpretation of each other's motions, that a decisive battle must soon happen) the king wrote several pressing letters to the marquis, conjuring him to complete his levies, and embark with all possible expedition. At the same time lord Rea was sent into Denmark and Holland to raise recruits; and a like commission was given to colonel Farenbach, concerning whose designs on the king's person we have spoken more distinctly in another place *. This bold and unaccountable adventurer (who had orders likewise to pass into England, and collect troops there) received his majesty's money to raise four regiments, and then very mysteriously disappeared, and returned to the Imperial service, where he had borne command under the emperor Mathias, and thence passed into the service of Sigismond king of Poland.

1631. It is more than probable, that these regiments were intended to join Hamilton; for the countries, in which they were to be raised, lay near the place, where the junction was proposed to be formed. Their number likewise corresponded with the number of troops promised; for as a Swedish regiment then contained 1008 men, of course this body of soldiers amounted precisely to the due contingent, with an addition only of two and thirty persons more than were mentioned in the stipulation. Nor could Gustavus expect any use or assistance from these new-raised recruits, but upon supposition they were to unite themselves with the marquis; and then both these little armies might render themselves superior to insults, and march on to their place of destination conformably to the king's orders. For 4000 men, raised in Holland, Frizeland, and Bremen, unsupported by the British troops, could not, without uncommon good fortune, have joined the king or Banier; inasmuch as Tilly lay between them and the former, and Pappenheim and Boninghausen betwixt them and the latter. These are little remarks, which tend much to the explanation of history, and cannot easily be made, except one understands the subject thoroughly, and knows precisely what each general was about, and where every body of troops was stationed at a certain period.

By this time Gustavus began to find great inconveniencies in the situation of his affairs, inasmuch as Charles was so extremely cautious in the declaration of his good intentions. And upon this occasion, the protestant princes in Germany put on a cold, reserved, and ambiguous air, reflecting (not without wisdom) how extremely dangerous any armament, or the publication of any one simple memorial, might prove to them, when the king of Great-Britain, environed by the sea, and removed at so considerable a distance from every ill effect, that could proceed from the houses of Austria and Spain, presumed only to act behind the scene, and guarded himself under the possibility of having recourse to subterfuges and excuses. Besides, they discovered plainly, that as he declared not boldly and avowedly for them, he was to be understood as acting to a certain degree against them. Upon this account Gustavus pressed hard, by the means of Camerarius his ambassador in Holland,

Holland, and Salvius his agent at Hamburg, to bring Charles into an explicit and open treaty, by which 10,000 men (to be paid by Great-Britain) were to be added to the marquis's army, and the escort above-mentioned: over all which troops the marquis, in case these proposals were accepted, was then to be declared general in chief, with this subsequent provision, that no peace should be concluded with the emperor, till the elector Palatin was re-instated in his patrimonial dominions. Charles listened to these proposals with an air of approbation, allowing himself at the same time to be cajoled interchangeably between the Austrian and Spanish ministry: but instead of consenting in a compendious manner, (which single stroke of politics, not uncommonly bold, would have crushed all the ambitious projects formed at Vienna and Munich, and produced in short time the final restoration of the Palatinate) he promised, in imitation of his father, to send an ambassador to finish the agreement. Whether any such minister went merely at that time, and on that errand, is more than I can take upon me to assert. Henry Vane was charged with a public commission to Gustavus, about half a year afterwards: but the critical opportunity had then vanished, and the elector of Saxony had declared for Sweden.

On July 16. the marquis, after having reviewed his troops, set sail from Yarmouth with a fleet of forty ships. In his way he stopped at Elfinoür, and went ashore to deliver letters from his master, in order to obtain a free passage, and pay his respects to that venerable warrior, Christian, king of Denmark. Gustavus had appointed him to land at Bremen, and had dispatched thither Lesly (afterwards earl of Lieven) to negotiate with the archbishop concerning the means of supplying the English army with provisions; and it was well known, that he amassed great quantities of bread and beer from Bremen and Hamburg. But when the marquis found, that the escort of 4000 men had not been sent him, according to promise, and that the enemy's troops covered a large tract of country between him and the grand Swedish camp, he thought proper, from his own impulse, having just touched at Oresund, to proceed onwards in his voyage, and landed in the mouth of the Oder, between Wolgast and the isle of Usedom; at which Gustavus was greatly piqued,

Indeed I cannot say there was any considerable body of Swedish troops then in Bremen; but Lesly, governor of Stralsund, appeared there in person by his master's orders. Todt likewise, and Banier, lay at some distance with no contemptible armies; and all the world knows, Gustavus was too good a general to run the risk of sacrificing such a brave body of allies, by leaving them in a forlorn and defenceless state. Mean while, Lesly was not a little astonished to see the king's plan broken in the very first step the marquis took, (who determined immediately to hoist sails, and pass onwards into Pomerania:) therefore, without ceremony, he embarked in a small vessel for Stetin, and thence hastened by land to the king, in order to know what fresh resolutions he would be pleased to take upon the destruction of his original design. His majesty, from that moment, disliked the marquis for not placing a due confidence in him; but having the talent never to be surprized with the breaking forth of any new incident, he changed his plan in an instant, and destined the British troops to serve on the banks of the Oder instead of the Wefer.

The fame of this little army, whose numbers were trebly magnified, struck great terror into the Imperial troops, and contributed more than can be well imagined, to the obtaining the battle of Leipsic: for Tilly thought himself obliged to detach six or seven thousand men into Silesia, to strengthen his army there, and re-inforce several garrisons on the occasion; the want of which soldiers greatly distressed him, when the decisive hour of action arrived.

The marquis landed 6000 men, English and Scottish, all in high spirits and florid health, for only two had died during the voyage. This diminutive army consisted of four regiments, each of which contained ten companies, and every company amounted to 150 men*. Burnet, 1631. who makes a sacrifice of Gustavus's character in order to aggrandize that of his hero the marquis, no where allows, that the stipulated escort of 4000 Swedes joined the English after their landing. But this mistake arose either from ignorance or design; for 4000 Swedes joined him, according to stipulation †, which arrived some few days after the re-inforcement, that the queen brought; and then the combined troops marched first to Stetin, and afterwards into Silesia, where Horn lay at that time, and whom Banier replaced.

It is true, numbers of the English perished by eating of the German bread, which is heavier, darker-coloured, and sourer than that of their own country: they suffered too by an immoderate fondness for new honey, of which they found great abundance in those parts; nor did the German beer agree with their constitutions. They came fresh likewise into a country, that had been ravaged by the pestilence. Of course this body of troops proved but of little service in the sequel of the war. For they were new-raised recruits, the very off-scouring of the people; and, in order to justify this assertion, it must be observed, that Gustavus had no intention to make use of them upon trying occasions, and about his person, till they had been better seasoned and disciplined in the art of war.

The magnificence of Hamilton's table, his equipage, and liveries, appeared to have more the air of a prince, than of a subject. He had forty gentlemen's sons, by way of pages and volunteers, and a body of guards, which amounted to 200 men. He was received in the camp at Werben (for thither he went without his army) in a manner the most affectionate and most polite, that can be conceived. Gustavus made him a thousand apologies, for the bareness and scantiness of the quarters allotted to his troops; and having conferred with him many hours in private, shewed him the dispositions he had made in order to give Tilly a soldier-like reception. By this time the British troops were advanced to the banks of the Oder, and thither the marquis hastened to take the 1651. command of them upon himself* ; but never could obtain the power of being declared general in chief, when the junction was to be formed betwixt him and the Swedish commander; that honour being strenuously denied him, except his Britannic majesty should think fit to add 10,000 fresh men, conformably to the proposal lately made by Gustavus, which we mentioned transiently as we passed along.

Some little time after the decisive engagement at Leipzig, the king ordered the marquis to supply the deficiency amongst his British troops with German recruits, for the expences of which he promised to become responsible; and from thence we may infer, that his Britannic majesty only sent an army into Germany, but was not extremely punctual in remitting the payment that belonged to it. Soon after this, the marquis received instructions to quit the banks of the Oder, and make what acquisitions he could in Silesia: but his army, from causes above assigned, was reduced to little more than two complete regiments; and what was worse, had subsisted ever since its arrival, in countries half depopulated by pestilence, and where the provisions had been twice consumed by enemies and friends: nor could he, in this new expedition, obtain more than 500 auxiliary troops to co-operate with him. Nevertheless, he and his Britons were delighted with the thoughts of making an invasion into Silesia, a duchy † extremely fertile in itself, and little, if at all, impoverished by the preceding wars. He had there the good fortune to raise the siege of Crossen, which was more easily effected, as most of the inhabitants were protestants. He then took Guben (the second and best-peopled town in Lower Lusatia) by surprize; and had probably mastered Glogau ‡ next, if Gustavus, for political reasons, had not recalled him;

* Monro's Second Expedition, Part ii. 52, 53.

† Some modern writers have assured us, that this duchy, which is about 240 miles long by 60 broad, more or less, contains 100 well peopled cities and towns, 333 small market towns and larger villages, 4000 gentlemen's houses, including 803 castles, and an infinite number of little villages and hamlets. The reader is desired not to take this account upon my authority, for the computation appears to me to be exaggerated.

‡ This town gives name to a considerable duchy, which the emperor had conferred on Walstein, as a remuneration in part for his great services. Walstein had fitted up the castle with his usual magnificence. There is one particularity in this duchy; the daughters inherit preferably to the collateral males. at the same time giving him to understand, that the elector of Saxony had undertaken to make the conquest of Silesia, as that province lay most convenient for him. 1631.

The Scottish nobleman was transported with rage, to see himself obliged to quit so plentiful a country. He had once a mind to have continued there in opposition to his majesty's orders; but that design would have amounted to nothing, for the Swedish commanders in the several garrisons, had authority given them, in case of his obstinacy, not to acknowledge him as an ally. If this conduct of Gustavus should chance to puzzle the reader, he will upon a moment's reflection discover, that the Swedish policy was not amiss in this respect: for as no explicit compact had been made about re-inflating Frederic, either as elector Palatin or king of Bohemia; and as Silesia belonged to the crown of Bohemia in the light of an incorporated and annexed province, Gustavus wisely foresaw, that what the English conquered there, would be supposed by that nation to be conquered for the Palatin's use; and that it was much more plausible and political too, to turn their force another way, than to dispossess them. Besides, his scheme was not to contract for the restoration of Frederic (though he had that event sincerely and really at heart) till Charles thought fit to engage more avowedly and strenuously in the war, and advanced larger and more regular supplies of men and money.

Hamilton therefore, with manifest ill will, marched to Magdeburg at the head of 1500 national troops, and 2000 or more German infantry, which he had levied conformably to the orders of the king of Sweden, and at his expence. His instructions were to join Banier, who conducted about the same number of troops, and co-operate with him in forming the blockade of the aforesaid city, about six months after Tilly had taken it by storm. There was little good to be expected from this project, for the soldiers within and under the walls (not to mention out-guards and advanced parties) were almost as numerous as those, that invested the avenues of the town; so that the most Gustavus could propose, (except some singular piece of good fortune should chance to present itself) was to reduce the garrison, and the troops encamped

And now the marquis's resentment was thoroughly awakened; for he found, that Banier not only affected the superior command, but was determined to possess it; for he carried the king's authority in his pocket, to be produced and used, in case disputes should proceed to extremity.

Upon this, coldness and reservedness soon gave birth to expostulations and recriminations; at length their reciprocal ill-will to each other amounted to a mortal hatred, and each would have been glad to have sacrificed his antagonist to private passion; for Banier, who was extremely well born, would not bate the marquis one jot in the articles of pride, and self-opinion: not to mention, that he considered himself (and justly too) as one of the ablest generals then in Europe. And though the marquis possessed all the gallantry, magnificence, and personal bravery, that ought to adorn the man of quality; yet he was then only entered into the twenty fourth or twenty fifth year of his age, and for that reason Gustavus, in the original draught of the articles between them, chose to annex an adviser or counsellor, that is, in other words, an elder general, with him in the military command. In vain the British nobleman preferred remonstrance after remonstrance, in order to obtain the supreme direction of the armies: it was told him by Gustavus, that the contrary practice was highly expedient to the public service; and in consequence of this declaration, letters were dispatched to London, beseeching Charles to recommend the doctrine of subordination to his general, and exhorting him likewise to transmit the pay of the troops, not to the marquis of Hamilton, but to the king of Sweden: which proposals were agreed to, as some historians assert*.

In the course of these resentments, the marquis behaved in a very spirited manner against Banier, who, contrary to the judgment of his British colleague, had declined giving Pappenheim battle, who then advanced in order to raise the blockade of Magdeburg. Banier produced his orders not to hazard the Swedish and German troops, and immediately commanded a retreat to be founded. The truth was, which either Burnet knew not, or chose to suppress, that Boninghausen, after an obstinate conflict, had thrown 1300 men into the town. Banier then passed the Sala, and besought the marquis to do the same, who refused him positively, being assured by Sir Jacob Astley, as an eye-witness, that the pass, through which he was to march his division, was so secure and so defensible, that he might pursue his journey at a quarter of an hour's notice, and give defiance to all Pappenheim's attacks. Be that as it will, Pappenheim in truth (whose army was much weaker than that of the combined nations, though it was always his policy to double the number of his men in common reports) had no other object in view, than to raise the blockade and carry off the garrison, which amounted to 3000 well disciplined troops: not to mention such bodies of soldiers as were stationed in strong posts and important passes round the town.

Thus ended the campaign of 1631, with respect to the marquis, who paid a visit to the king, and was received with great cordiality and politeness.

And now, about the middle of September, 1632, Henry Vane arrived at Wurtzburg in his ambassadorial capacity. His proposals were, that Gustavus should give the marquis a separate army, and a separate command; and that the said army, conjointly with such troops as might hereafter be sent from England, and in co-operation with such as were levied and supported with English money, should act uniformly and unceasingly for the recovery of the Palatinat. But Gustavus took the matter in a higher tone than he had made use of formerly; so that Vane and he parted upon very ill terms: in consequence whereof, he declined giving the marquis a commission to levy a new army, and excused himself from paying the money, that was expended in Silesia to form a body of recruits there; and Oxenstiern told the British general, with some warmth, that he had received great sums from Charles his master, and must not pretend to amuse them with an account of injuries committed on his own private fortunes.

Thus that nobleman, as early as the month of April, in the year we are now speaking of, found himself to be neither a general nor even a colonel, for his whole corps was reduced to one English regiment and 1631. one Scottish. Bellandin, afterwards created a peer, commanded one, and Hamilton, brother to the earl of Hadinton, conducted the other: both which regiments being incorporated into duke Bernard's army, the marquis contented himself to follow Gustavus as a volunteer.

His Britannic majesty made an indistinct reply to all this embroilment which Oxenstiern's rough speech had occasioned: he gave the money as king, and did not give the money as king; he served the Swedes openly, and he served them clandestinely. The marquis in one light was accountable to the nation, and in one light was not accountable to the nation. But the postscript of one of the king's letters at this period contains something pretty extraordinary. The words are these;

“ I hope shortly you will be in a possibility to perform your promise concerning pictures and statues at Munechen (Munich): therefore now, in earnest, do not forget it.”

Now as this letter bears date April 30, 1632*, it is plain the king of Sweden had entered Bavaria, and even passed the Lech almost a month before it was written. The cast therefore of it, as Charles by this time began to be fully assured that the whole electorate would be more or less subjected to a kind of military decimation, may be understood by many, as obliquely suggesting (for the king knew well the pedigree and excellence of every good picture and statue in the grand collection at Munich) that some few of these curiosities might be treated conformably to the science of true virtuoso-ship.—Whatever appearance the thing may have, I shall presume to say nothing on the occasion; and if the bare mention thereof had not fallen immediately and essentially within the course of my narrative, I should have passed by a circumstance relating to a prince, whom, in the character of a restorer, and protector of the fine arts, every man of taste ought for ever to respect. Nevertheless the scheme or idea, whatever it might be, was in all probability rendered abortive by a peremptory disapprobation on the part of Gustavus; which one cannot affect to be sorry for, since the Trenks and Mentzels of our own age, when they made an irruption into Bavaria at the head of a rapacious band of

Much more happened at this time with reference to Great-Britain (wherein the marquis was partly concerned) and his Swedish majesty; but that will present itself more naturally, when we shall undertake to give a full account of Sir Henry Vane's embassy. It may suffice, therefore, to conclude with observing, that some months before the above mentioned embroilments had taken their rise from Oxenstiern's warmth of temper, Charles had conceived a strong inclination to recall the marquis, perceiving plainly, that he stood on no good footing with Gustavus, and that there was little hope of procuring for him a separate command; and as he had, in common with his father, a mighty itching for new negotiations, visionary projects, and temporary expedients, he proposed to his general, to send him with a new army into the Lower Palatinate, in order to assist the French, who had promised to conquer it, and consign it into his hands by way of depositum; though at the same time he adds, that he cannot consider French promises as matters of authenticity. Nor did he judge amiss in this respect; for as the scheme was chimerical, so it ended in nothing.

And now the chancellor Oxenstiern proposed a fresh league, offensive and defensive, between Sweden and England, in a higher tone of language, and under exceptions and limitations much more severe, than had been expressed in the last offer he made: for there the power of concluding peace was to be vested reciprocally in each contracting party, but here it was to reside entirely in his Swedish majesty's breast. As this single assumption of prerogative caused the whole state of the question to vary, Vane and he parted with much malignity. The marquis petitioned for a new army, and Gustavus amused him with a new delay. He urged remonstrance upon remonstrance; but all was vain. Gustavus spoke of Charles, his brother-king, in terms of anger and bitterness, but at the same time told the marquis, that he was thoroughly

1632. sensible of his services; and at all distances, and in all places, should consider him as one, that peculiarly appertained to him. Upon this, the English general (all proposals being thus rendered incompatible on either side) respectfully took his leave at Neustadt, about the middle of September, 1632, six weeks before the king's death, being escorted four miles by all the English and Scottish officers in the Swedish service; and taking with him the colonels Sir James Hamilton and Sir James Ramfey (which latter was surnamed the fair) as also the valiant colonel Hepburn, who, as we shall observe hereafter, in spite of all representations and applications, never could be induced to forgive the king the affront, real or imaginary, which lay upon his spirits. In a word, as matters stood upon this disagreeable footing between the sovereigns of Great-Britain and Sweden, one cannot blame the marquis for declining the post of volunteer for life. Nevertheless, his few remaining soldiers entertained no thought, that their general, or their country, had been ill used, for they all incorporated themselves into the Swedish service; nor did the Scots in particular (the most jealous of any people in Europe, with respect to national affronts) ever withdraw themselves from Gustavus's ensigns upon this occasion, though at that time three or four of them were officers of the field (as the language then ran) and upwards of twenty served the king in the capacity of colonels; not that so many occur in the course of my history, for some acted in separate armies under Oxenstiern, Horn, Banier, and others, and some were quartered in Livonia and Sweden*.

Thus ended the fortunes of the separate army, chiefly English, which the marquis commanded; whereas, if Charles had made a bold and explicit treaty at first, in his own name, and authorized it by regal sanction and that of a parliament; if a proper fund had been settled for the support of these auxiliary troops, and a British commissary been sent to pay them weekly or monthly; if the disposal of all vacant commissions had been vested in the national general, and him only; then Charles, I say, might have made points of the recovery and restoration of the Palatinate. He might have employed his own soldiers in that par-

And had he insisted upon this, and many other points of a like nature, at that time, when assistance would have come with its true grace, and at a proper season, certain it is and undeniable, that Gustavus and Oxenstiern would have embraced his proposals with uncommon joy. But the misfortune of our king was, that he often saw and did what was right; but was always unlucky both in the manner of proposing, and the time of performing.

But to return to our German part of the history. Whilst Gustavus lay intrenched within the angle, which is formed by the confluence of the Elb and Havel, and as he was walking on the banks of one of these rivers, all alone, in a meditating mood, conformably to his usual custom; he was surprized with the voices of ten or twelve young cavaliers, who were talking with a great deal of vivacity, and seemed to shape their course towards the Swedish quarters. The king dispatched a centinel or two to summon them to him; but as these volunteers talked neither German nor Swedish, they could only answer by signs. Gustavus guessing their errand, spoke to them very politely in Latin, and offered to incorporate them that very day into the best body of troops then in the service. For it was remarkable in this prince, that he studied the physiognomy, and watched the conduct, of every young man of fashion, that carried arms under him, and asked the respective colonels every day, what sort of turn of mind, and what kind of military genius they discovered in these new adventurers, during their apprenticeship in the art of war. Nor was this all; for he often conversed with the meanest of his soldiers, and knew numbers of them by their names. Having well-analyzed the characters of these new volunteers in his own mind, he conceived a very favourable opinion of one of them, and presented him soon afterwards with two fine war-horses, saying at the same time, Sir, I do not give them you; I only pay you for the merit I see you have. This young man was Gassion, afterwards maréchal of France, one of the most intrepid and enterprising warriors of that age*. The king gave him

In one of those desperate rencounters, which happened almost every day between the two contending armies, his majesty recommended him very particularly to the care of the commander of the party. Gassion had the good fortune to take a German officer prisoner, a young man of considerable estate and quality: and as ransoms at that time ran very high, with respect to people of fashion, Gustavus gave the whole profit to the young Frenchman, as he used to call him; and was greatly pleased, when Gassion told him, that he liked the air and manners of his prisoner so well, that, poor as he was, he was determined to forgive him all the debt, provided the said officer would do him the favour to instruct him in the Swedish and German languages, that thereby he might be the better enabled both to give and receive commands. Upon this event, in concurrence with some other promising indications, Gustavus in a few days conceived so high an opinion of Gassion, that he ordered him to come privately on horse-back to his tent at midnight, where, after some short discourse, he sent him out on an expedition of consequence, which was conducted by the baron Teüffel, one of his favourite colonels.

By this time the affair of Werben received its conclusion; where Tilly found himself greatly exceeded, not only in the military art, but in the methods of encampment and subsisting an army. In vain he boasted of having defeated and ruined two kings, and that he should crush a third, who was but a young man, with inconsiderable difficulty; but the event did not justify the rodomontade. True it is, he attacked Gustavus more times than one, but was never able to carry his point. He allured maréchal of France. He served first in the Genoese war, under the constable Lesdiguières; acted afterwards with the duke de Rohan, in Languedoc, and bore a share through all the campaigns in Savoy and Piemont, till the peace of Querasque was concluded. He then conceived a desire of asking a command under the emperor, but the maréchal de Thoiras dissuaded him; and in the 23d year of his age, he pre-sentent himself to the king of Sweden. Richelieu mortally hated the abrupt impetuosities of this officer; and being advised one day to confer the command of Rantzau's army upon him, replied hastily in the negative, I know Rantzau gets drunk sometimes, but Gassion was born drunk. See more in Folard, Tom. i. 229.

him to a final decision upon plain ground: but the king kept his post with inflexible firmness; for, though naturally brave and jealous of affronts to the highest degree, yet he had too great a game at stake to allow the congenial warmth of his temper to get the better of his sedate reflection: and as it was now no time to indulge a romantic gallantry, he submitted patiently to become an object of astonishment to his own troops, whose ardour, as we observed before, he could but barely suppress upon this trying occasion. Nevertheless, that he might the better convince his officers, and compose their minds by force of argument, he convened a council of war (a practice not very constant with him) the night before Tilly attacked him, and there explained his whole plan to his generals, with such superiority of reasoning, that every person retired to his tent not only with acquiescence, but with entire satisfaction.

At length the Imperial general, unable to force an engagement, and unwilling to see his troops perish by hunger, made a march by way of feint, as if he proposed to return to Magdeburg. But the king was not to be allured from his well-chosen situation. He remained firm in his post, and allowed his enemy to make what motions he thought best on that side of his empire. This coolness of the king disappointed Tilly, and mortified him likewise; and at length, not knowing well what steps to pursue, he pointed his course in earnest, first to Tangermund*, and then to Einleben, a town famous for its magnificent Gothic tombs erected to the honour of the counts of Mansfelt†, but more renowned for being known to be Martin Luther's place of nativity.

The treaty abovementioned (the full substance whereof, in reference to the contracting powers on either side, Chemnitius has thought it highly expedient to preserve ||) may be considered as the ground-work, upon which Gustavus, and the German princes, all erected their future alliances. The main draught of it had been contrived and reduced to articles many months before, but it never arrived to any actual conclusion, till now at Werben.

Upon this, Fugger, watch-master general of the army of the league, with a view to hinder the landgrave from infusing spirits into the electorate of Saxony, by declaring so explicitly in behalf of Gustavus, advanced with ten regiments, that had been raised by the said league, as mate of all the German abbies. After his election, he pays the pope, his only ecclesiastical superior, the inconsiderable sum of about 40 l. The pope in 1727 allowed him the power of causing himself to be chosen suffragan or vicar general. All the members of his abbey (which is of the Benedictin order) must be noble; and in them is vested the power of election. The abbot in Gustavus's time, [Bernard Schenk chosen March 12, 1623] made no ceremony of cloathing himself in armour, and following the fortunes of Tilly and Walstein, was killed at the battle of Lutzen not very gloriously, for having mounted the stair-case of the wind-mills, that stood at some distance from the main action, (and which are to be seen at this moment) he had his head struck off by a cannon-ball.

far as Vacha in Lower-Hesse: but not confiding over-much in new-raised troops, he adventured first to try the talents of his party in the persuasive way, and sent letters from Tilly to the states of the province, exhorting them to make amends for the indiscretion of their prince by a prompt and voluntary return to the emperor. Count Furstenberg at the head of a good body of Imperialists, having compelled the circles of Suabia and Franconia to renounce the conclusions agreed upon at Leipzig, meditated another irruption into Hesse on the side of Fulda; but the storm soon blew over, for the latter general received counter-orders to march and join Tilly, and carried with him forty-one troops of horse, and thirty-five companies of foot. Tieffenbach formed another corps for the same purpose out of the garrisons of Silesia and Lusatia, and John, baron Aldringer *, with all possible expedition marched an army of 8000

* Born of obscure parents in the county of Luxemburg, was originally valet de chambre, and then secretary to a French nobleman, but rose at length, upon Cratz's being superseded, to the supreme command of the Bavarian army. He applied himself extremely to reading, and was employed in the chancery at Trent: but as he was a man of prompt and enterprising parts, his colleagues soon conceived a jealousy against him, and counterworked and traversed him so much, that in a rage, (conformably to the superstition of those times) he quitted his employment, and determined to take up the profession of the first man he met upon the road. In his way to Insprach, he lighted on a soldier crossing a bridge, and marched with him into Italy. His pen rendered him very serviceable in the regiment wherein he enlisted, and soon raised him to a lieutenant's command; and as at the head of fifty men he defended a post to admiration, he was chosen by a nephew of the archbishop of Saltzburg to be his military director, and advanced by him to the place of serjeant-major. He then rose to the office of colonel (an employment of great importance and honour in those days, some colonels having commanded a body of twelve or fifteen thousand men;) and in the year 1630 had, upon the

He was the best debater of that age in a council of war, and was thought necessary in Bavaria to compose the misunderstandings between that court and Vienna. He had the misfortune to be wounded in the head at the passage of the Lech, being then a general, and grand master of the artillery. The same campaign he joined Walstein in Bohemia, notwithstanding all the efforts, that were made against this junction, but returned to Bavaria to oppose Horn. His best exploit as a general (after my period of history concludes) was his contributing to raise the siege of Constance in 1633. He then served under the duke of Feria, who conducted the Spanish troops, and by Walstein's orders contrived to thwart and perplex him to such a degree, as to break his heart: for the duke was a person of very delicate sensation in point of honour and all engagements between man and man. The public esteemed him to be one of the finest gentlemen of that age, and it was his character to be humane and merciful beyond description. He was known at home to be the best politician in the court of Madrid, but it was his unhappiness to take late to the profession of arms, merely by the compulsion of his master.

1631. 8000 men, proposing and expecting to reach his generalissimo in about three weeks. Many of these troops were men of approved service, and had performed great things in Italy under their commander.

And here it may be worth remarking, that ever since the publication of the Leipzig conclusions, the house of Austria had not been inattentive to the part, which the court of Saxony might think fit to assume, and of course Hagenmüller, one of the interior council at Vienna, had been dispatched to the elector with instructions to beseech him and his colleagues to omit the levying of soldiers on the one hand, and allow free passage and subsistence on the other hand to the Imperial armies (since all such military assistances should be considered as things of a momentary, and not permanent duration) requesting him likewise to perform the part of a mediator, and produce a peace between Gustavus and the emperor; which latter proposal was not disagreeable to the elector's private cast of politics, nor did it cross the opinion of Arnheim, who was in effect his prime-minister, as well as his general. Yet the ground this prince was to fix his footing upon was of an unstable and crumbling contexture: he therefore made fresh professions of loyalty and obedience to the house of Austria, secretly enclined to do it service, if a fair opportunity presented itself; but this was only a

He died of grief at Munich, much in the manner as his predecessor and instructor, the great Spinola, died at Scrivia, and of the self-same malady.

Aldringer was killed in the same year, 1634, on the bridge at Landshut, whether by the Swedes or his own men, is uncertain. One may suspect the latter, for with all his parts, and several good qualities, he was austere, passionate and revengeful. He attempted to kill Sirot for drawing on a lieutenant-colonel in his presence (though the provocation was great and sudden) and never could be induced to spare his life (so far as it lay in his power to affect it) either at the council of war in Italy, or in his representation to the supreme council at Vienna. His parts were so solid, adroit, penetrating, and lively, that he was usually called the Spaniard Italianised. Which puts me in mind of a very figurative observation, (which comes nearer to Aldringer's case) made, if I mistake not, by the author of the Memoirs of the duke de Grammont, for not having the work before me, I take the liberty to quote by memory; Un Allemand dépaisé & Italienisé est un diable incarné.

I must observe, lastly, that he drew up most of the political papers and manifestos, that were published in behalf of the catholic league. He amassed vast wealth in the plunder of Mantua, not much to his honour. Nevertheless he spent it with magnificence and profusion, and yet left considerable sums in the banks of Genoa and Venice. After receiving the fatal wound, he passed the little time he lived in making strict enquiries after the person who shot him. He was buried with great marks of honour. The emperor had created him first a baron, and then a count.

transient private wish, and not a settled political principle; for at the same time he knew Gustavus, and did not chuse to undertake a work where the least duplicity might at once undo him: on this account he resigned himself to that fluctuation of mind, which is usually determined by the doctrine of apparent convenience. Something likewise was insinuated, as if the house of Austria should consider certain measures (supposing them to be taken) as a sort of high-treason against the empire; and, what was still less political, the letters from Munich took the liberty to talk in the same tone*.

The better to enforce this doctrine, all the combined troops, of which I have formerly given an enumeration, were intended to overpower the elector of Saxony, and the Imperialists had the presumption to call themselves the invincible army. Mean while Tilly attempted to draw the elector into the catholic interests by gentle means, and upon this account requested him, as he was then at Mersburg, to give an audience to three persons, deputed from him with full authority to treat and ratify; namely, John Reinart of Metternich, (who was the catholic administrator of the diocese of Magdeburg,) Otho Frederic, baron de Schomberg, grand master of the artillery (who was killed at Leipzig) and Bernardi his secretary. The elector, who loved hospitality, gave them a very plentiful repast, and dissembled his resentments extremely well; but after dinner told them coldly, that he considered himself and the emperor as Ulysses and Polypheme, and that the only favour he had to expect, was to be devoured the last. Saxony, continued he, is reserved as the dessert, which is to crown the Imperial banquet: but remember, gentlemen, that in the fruits, that help to compose a dessert, some are austere and of dangerous digestion, and some have stones, that can only be cracked to the detriment of the teeth †.

He pronounced these words with so forbidding an air, that the commissioners hardly cared to proceed to business. However, at length they explained to him Tilly's proposals, which when compared to what had happened, and what naturally might happen, with reference to the conduct of the house of Austria, were considered as meer sounds, and not as realities.

1631. Enraged at this diffidence in the court of Dresden, the Imperial general was induced to make a false step as a politician, and ruined himself and his master's cause, greatly to the disapprobation of that wise and artful prince the duke of Bavaria *. It was his business mildly to have allured the elector into the catholic interests by all sorts of promises, concessions, and gratifications; and, in case nothing of that nature could have succeeded, he then should have removed his arms from Saxony (which single circumstance might have composed and pacified the elector, who wished nothing more than an exemption from war) and transported the scene of action into Pomerania and Mecklenberg, since by such a diversion Gustavus in the long run must have been obliged to follow him; for the king in those days could not have subsisted, if the intercourse had been cut off between him and Sweden. But Tilly's genius and fortune both began to verge towards a decline. Either ill luck made this general fretful, or his fretfulness blinded his judgment, and rendered him unlucky: but be that as it will on one hand or the other, sure it is, that he delivered himself up to the peevishness of old age, and the transports of resentment. Of course, without waiting for the return of the deputies, he, on the side of Leipzig, having united Furstenberg's army (which consisted of 10,000 men,) to his own forces; and Holk † and Gallas ‡ conjoined,

He succeeded Coalto, in conjunction with Aldringer, at the siege of Mantua, and rose at length to one of the supreme commands in the Imperial army. He generously released old count Thurn, whom he happened to take prisoner in Silesia, either from greatness of mind, as he did not chuse a brave enemy should die ignominiously on a scaffold, or from the fear probably, (as hath been suggested elsewhere) of disobliging Wallstein. This retarded his preferment for some months; but on the assassination of that general, in whose death he would take no public part (though it is thought by some, that he gave him an oblique side in his fall) the court thought it worth while to make use of his assistances. He died in 1646, and left behind him one of the finest palaces in Prague, where the family is still settled.

joined, on the side of Misnia, poured into the electorate like two raging torrents, and spread nothing round them but devastation; for they had upon the whole at least 40,000 soldiers under their command. No military execution hath resembled this irruption, but that unhappy one, which Turenne was obliged to make into the Palatinate in 1674, and which continues an everlasting reproach to the humanity of his nature and the politeness of the nation, which he served. And though courts in the final examination of things are principally to be blamed for these barbarities, yet the generals, who carry them into execution, can neither be justified by their friends, nor can they disculpate themselves to their own consciences. And, as if Providence ordained, that such actions should counterwork the very intentions of their first contrivers, the inhabitants of Saxony, far from being terrified thereby, were rather hardened against the emperor. Nevertheless, when their deputies remonstrated with Tilly, on account of the depopulations and ravages committed by his soldiers, he replied with a constrained countenance, That his Walloons and Burgundians were not birds; nor could they subsist on insubstantial air: and then dismissed the remonstrators with an adage of Cato, desiring it might make some impression on their memories, Fronte capillatâ, post est occasio calva. Thus a necessity of the house of Austria's own creation, (for Tilly owns in a letter dated seventeen days after the battle of Leipzig, that he entered Saxony conformably to a mandate directed to him from Vienna *) forced the elector into the arms of the king of Sweden, to whom, as he still continued in his camp at Werben, being determined not to move till he was first invited, Arnheim was immediately dispatched on post-horses, to implore his assistance, and beseech him to raise the siege of Leipzig, which town, the most important in Saxony by way of wealth and commerce, was then actually invested by the Imperial general; whom a large cannon-ball malignantly spared, killing a cavalier, that fate on horse-back close

The king of Hungary gave him the supreme direction at the famous battle of Nordlingen, as did also the cardinal-infant at the same king's request. His disposition so was fine, that Leganez, a renowned general, could not help crying out,

Gustavus received Arnheim with an air of dignity, and told him coldly, that nothing had happened but what he foresaw, and had predicted to his master on various occasions: he scrupled not to own, that he had taken his motions with a view to force this event into existence; and that if the elector had lent a favourable ear to his representations, neither Magdeburg had been taken, nor Saxony in danger. He then interspersed a few condolences artfully enough, and concluded with saying, That he had formed a plan of employing his troops to great advantage elsewhere, being obliged out of gratitude to support the elector of Brandenburg, and the princes of Lower Saxony: yet he was always ready, as a man of honour and generosity, to forgive the unfortunate, and protect them: expecting nevertheless upon such concessions and advances made on his part; That the electoral prince should serve in his army as an hostage;—That the town of Wittemberg should be consigned to him for a place of retreat ;—That the elector should furnish his troops with three month's pay;—That he should produce the traitors of the Austrian faction, that had given him evil counsel;—And that he, Gustavus, should be their judge †;—And lastly, that a treaty should be signed offensive and defensive between the king of Sweden and the elector of Saxony.*

Arnheim flew to his master on wings of joy, (if his own account might be credited) and returned directly with the following answers; That the elector as well as the prince his son would make their residence in the Swedish army;—That not Wittemberg^o only, but the whole electorate should be open to the Swedes in case of a retreat;—That a month's pay should be advanced immediately, and security given for the residue;—That a specification should be delivered in of the several traitors, who should all be punished in the most exemplary manner * ;—And, finally, the elector empowered Arnheim to declare, '1631' that he would embark his life and fortunes in the cause of Sweden; concluding with equal candor and politeness, that his obligations to Gustavus were proportionable to his distresses.

These preliminaries being thus adjusted, it was added farther on the part of the elector, from his own free gratuitous motion, that he would undertake to subsist the Swedish army so long as they continued in Saxony, and undertook the defence thereof; that he would resign to the king all the rights of supreme command, rendering himself conformable to his will as far as all human compliance could carry him; and in the last place gave his honour to conclude no peace without his majesty's concurrence.

To all which replies and proposals, Gustavus answered compendiously, without making a moment's pause: That the elector must pardon him for taking the liberty to insist upon securities, as he had so long kept his attention on the perpetual alarm. Nevertheless, if he advanced but a month's pay to his soldiers, he would take upon him to promise, that they should earn it well; provided always, the supreme direction resided in himself alone; for there the king would have no competitor.

It may appear matter of astonishment to many, why the elector of Saxony did not conjoin himself with Gustavus sooner! But remarkers of this stamp allow themselves to be imposed upon by the first superficial appearances of things; Qui ad pauca respiciunt, de facili pronuntiant, saith the historian. For upon a closer examination, it appears to me, that the Saxon ministers (if you can excuse them being pensioners to the court of Vienna) were neither weak men nor cowards: a neutrality, had that been possible, was the wisest measure, that they could pursue; they had no desire to crush Gustavus or the house of Austria: but matters at length proceeded to such extremities, that there remained no middle course to steer: for the Imperial resentments blazed forth in earnest on the one hand (inasmuch that when Hagenmüller, the Austrian ambassador, made an offer to kiss the elector's hand on his return to Vienna, he plainly told him it was the kiss of Judas :) and Gustavus,

* Arnibalæi Arma Suecica, 184.

1631. on the other hand, was a monarch, that was neither to be trifled with nor cajoled. Nor had the former conduct of John George, the person in question (whether casually or prudentially I will not take upon me to assert) occasioned any notable disadvantage to the king of Sweden, if we except the mortification and disappointment his majesty underwent with reference to Magdeburg: and the entire disbelief, that this prince, and the other protestant powers, would ever presume to join Gustavus, till after the completion of some very unfavourable event to the house of Austria, was the secret reason, which gave that monarch time and leisure to take root and flourish, like a tree, unobserved; for at first, Tilly, Wallstein, and their masters, all overlooked him and despised him. Nay, it is probable our hero would have been greatly retarded in the execution of his enterprize, if the Leipzig confederation (well interspersed with protestations of allegiance to the emperor) had tended openly to the espousal of the Swedish cause; for three Imperial generals lay then hovering round the electorate we are now speaking of; and Tilly, in case he had omitted the siege of Magdeburg, might have posted himself between Pomerania and Saxony.—From all which it appears, that the Dresden ministers were not such weak or unsuccessful politicians, at this trying conjuncture, as most people have been apt to imagine.

The aspect of the German hemisphere began now to presage a storm; upon the pre-sentiment of which, the Imperialists and princes of the league were resolved to make a considerable effort. The emperor sent his prime minister, the prince of Eggenberg*, into Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, to beat the drum, in order to collect a fresh supply of men: the same was done in Bohemia, Hungary, Moravia, and Silesia. Cardinal Ditrichstein † raised some regiments himself: and the new le-

This prelate was severely questioned by the Moravians, whether he acted in concert with Wallstein or not, in 1619: had a guard placed round him, and was obliged to give his parole of honour (which he did with tears) not to quit the country without the privity of the states. vied Bavarian recruits, both of infantry and cavalry, were pronounced to be the finest to appearance, that Europe had then seen. 1631.

Upon this, Tilly, at the head of 44,000 veteran troops, having miscarried in the attempt of crossing the Elb at Torgau, which the vigilance of Arnheim prevented, rendered himself master of Zeitz and Merzburg; and then investing Leipzig, sent word to the commander, that, except he surrendered immediately, he must expect the fate of Magdeburg. The governor requested leave to ask the elector's advice, who lay encamped at Torgau, about thirty miles from him; but that indulgence was denied him. Some slight resistance he afterwards made; and a cannon-ball, unfortunately for Tilly's reputation, missed killing him, as we observed before, by an hair's breadth escape. The town was given up the second day; three messengers were hanged, who brought exhortations from the elector to the governor, to acquit himself like a man of honour; and the castle of Pleißenberg, which might have made a week's resistance, surrendered by way of imitation, with no small infamy. Yet so relaxed was the discipline of the Saxon army in those days, that the same man, whose name I think was Vopel, was replaced in his government after the battle of Leipzig, and delivered up the citadel a second time in the same manner to general Holk, the year ensuing. The unhappy town redeemed itself from plunder, by the mediation of as much money as amounted to 32,000*l.* or thereabouts.

And here it may be worth observing incidentally, that Oxenstiern had no hand in the important and critical negotiation above mentioned betwixt his master and the elector of Saxony; for at that time he commanded a separate army in Regal Prussia, being directed to observe the countenance of the Polanders. And indeed, so great and versatile were Gustavus's parts in all respects, that he had rarely occasion for him as a politician, even in the most pressing emergencies, any farther than to free himself from a multiplicity of trouble and business. Whilst Oxenstiern secured the eastern part of Germany, which confines on the Baltic, Horn and Banier were commanded to clear the western part: for his Swedish majesty, in the midst of his conquests, always secured the possibility of a good retreat. These two generals established a regency

1631. in the provinces of Magdeburg and Halberstadt. Banier blockaded the former, (as hath been already mentioned) but Pappenheim obliged him to raise the siege. Nevertheless, when the duke of Lunenburg joined him with a small but well conducted army, the Imperial general was compelled to evacuate Magdeburg, abandon the open country, and retire thence to Westphalia and Franconia, into which circles the Swedes pursued him step by step. Magdeburg being thus re-conquered, the few of its surviving inhabitants returned, for all the world admired the lenity of the Swedish government; many old emigrants flocked in from other countries; and under such auspicious protection, every person set himself to revive trade and rebuild the town.

Tilly's first view was to make his irruption into Saxony by way of Torgau, where there was a bridge over the Elb; hoping thereby, with great reason, to impede the junction of the Swedish and Saxon armies, by posting his troops in the mid-way betwixt them both: but Arnheim prevented him in that attempt, by pre-occupying a pass of such great importance. Mean while, Gustavus lay by, as a reserved and cautious spectator, at Wittemberg; and the elector of Brandenburg was with him. The elector of Saxony joined them there; and they all entered into as strong and solemnly-good intelligence as could be devised. Upon this, the Swedish army passed the Elb, and joined the Saxon forces near Dieben, a small town lying on the great road to Berlin, and about twelve miles from Leipzig. Here Gustavus convened the two electors into his own apartment; and held, at the same time, a grand political debate, and a council of war; where, with all the coolness of an experienced statesman, he proposed to act upon the defensive principle, supporting his ideas of the matter to this effect; " That, as Tilly had taken care
 " cious part would be, either to wait for some favourable opportunity to " attack him by surprize, or allure him by artificial marches into plain " ground, and decide the affair upon equal terms. For such an an" cient and prudent general, continued Gustavus, will never sacrifice
 " the flower of the Imperial troops, and the fair reputation of an un" interrupted

“ interrupted series of victories for thirteen years past, except the necessity be great and urgent: — and if he should happen to overcome us, you two princes are each of you lost beyond redemption.” But the elector of Saxony, impatient and enraged to the last degree, to see his country depopulated, and his subjects ruined by a sort of military inquisition, declared strenuously for a prompt and decisive battle: which opinion (being privately that of Gustavus) was, after some objections and representations, frankly complied with; and the rather, as Aldringer, who then lay at Erfurt, was not arrived with his part of the Imperial army. Upon this, Gustavus and John George, (the elector of Brandenburg for some private reasons being returned home) marched their combined troops within sight of the enemy, who, having conquered Leipzig-town and castle forty eight hours before, had advanced that day as far as Breitenfeld, a small town about four miles distant from Leipzig; which was thought by many a great oversight, whereof we shall give a distinct account hereafter. And it is still more remarkable, that Tilly knew nothing of the junction of the Swedes and Saxons till towards noon *, when he received intelligence from some of his partizans, that the united troops had been discovered in full march against him; and this he acknowledges in a letter, which we have cited some pages before. So that of course, he removed from Leipzig with a view to encounter only the elector of Saxony, who indeed had declared he would attack the Imperialists, in case Gustavus refused to join him. The old Walloon expected nothing more ardently than this event; for the electoral army amounted to something less than half the number of his; nor were the commanders, Arnheim excepted, (and his military character had some blemish) a set of men much renowned in war; and as to the common soldiers, they were new raised levies, and without experience.

No general ever acted with more coolness and prudence than Gustavus, in all the steps he took, that were previous to this great event. He determined, from the moment Tilly pointed his invasion into Saxony in good earnest, to advance near enough the elector, to be enabled to join

1631. him; and yet at the same time resolved, never to effect that junction, except after the most pressing and repeated solicitations; which indeed he wisely foresaw must soon be made him in the common nature of things. Having therefore reduced his thoughts to a system on this occasion, he made a speedy march, at the head of the best part of the cavalry, that belonged to the camp at Werben, and 2000 dragoons, to the important pass of Wittemberg, (leaving Bauditzen to command such regiments of horse as remained in their lines, and Hepburn the infantry) and secured his point before Tilly had received intelligence of his motions; issuing out orders at the same time, to Horn and Banier, to meet him immediately with their respective armies, at a place of rendezvous, sixteen miles from Wittemberg; and conveying like instructions to colonel Cag, who then lay at Havelburg with his own regiment and that of Monro. Here the king joined them, attended only by a few followers, and employed a week not only in reviewing and modelling them, but in giving the finishing hand to the treaty then in agitation betwixt him and John George. This march to Wittemberg may be considered as the key, which gave Gustavus entrance into his future walk of renown and glory. Yet so delicate was he in point of honour, and so extremely averse to make use of compulsive measures, in spite of all that superiority, which Providence had given him, that (having once secured the bridge of Wittemberg) he commanded his army to encamp on the western side of the Elb, (the elector and his forces being lodged on the eastern side) nor did he permit his troops to cross the river, till he received authority to march from the duke of Saxony.

When this junction was formed, it was matter of surprize to contemplate the appearance of the two combined armies. The Swedes had slept all night upon a dusty new-ploughed field, (for the season of the year was extremely dry,) insomuch that every regiment seemed to be clothed in one dirty uniform of the same brown colour; not to mention the dust they had raised in a march of eighteen miles that day: the Saxons, on the other hand, were well lodged and new apparalled, even to a fantastic degree of ostentation. The officers had adorned themselves

1631. selves with more plumage than heroes on a theatre; but neither they nor their soldiers fulfilled the observation of the historian, etiam uncti pugnant. Nevertheless, that exception seems reserved for the honour of the Prussian infantry in our days.

It was here the king received undoubted intelligence, that Tilly had taken Leipzig, and advanced to Breitenfeld: and not displeased to find, that an aged and experienced general had quitted a situation so extremely advantageous as that was near Leipzig, he, in spite of all fatigues, laid hold of the ardour of his troops, whilst they were in good humour and high spirits (that being a maxim with him) and marched them twelve miles the next morning, till he came in sight of the Imperial camp; having spent the early part of the day in close devotion, and commanded public prayers throughout the army.

Being now sure of coming to a general decision, inasmuch as Tilly had dislodged from a more commodious encampment, he left all his baggage and tents behind him, under a proper guard, partly that his retreat, in case of accidents, might not be encumbered; and partly, because it was his fixt resolution to sleep uncovered in the open fields, and keep the ardour of his followers on the full stretch, till the affair was terminated, which he had the power to bring on the next day. Thus, by a sort of conduct so very determined, it appeared plainly to the meanest soldiers, that their master had resolved to decide the fate of Germany in a less space of time than eight and forty hours.

Some days before this nearer approach of the protestant army, it is reported by several, that Tilly sent a trumpeter to the king, and (conformably to a custom not uncommon in those times) invited him, as a brave cavalier, to march forwards, and give him battle. Friend, said Gustavus to the messenger, with an air of disdain, tell your master I am a KING, as well as a cavalier, and shall make it my business to find him soon. And after this military herald was dismissed, he turned round, in a sort of pique, to his generals, and said, *That he should advance with pleasure, to make a collision betwixt a crown and two electoral bonnets on the one side, and the carcass of an old corporal on the other.

Those

* It was a common saying with Gustavus, that Tilly was an old corporal, Wallstein a madman, but 1631. Those of Tilly's army, who allowed themselves to be operated upon by superstitious presages, were much dejected, when it appeared that the general, by meer chance, had held his council of war, two evenings before the battle, in the house of a poor man, whose business it was to be gentleman-usher to the funerals in the suburbs of Leipzig. The very house, if I mistake not, is still shewn, and the outside walls appear to have been decorated with skulls, coffins, hour-glasses, and shank-bones, painted in fresco. It hath been observed by some, that the undaunted Pappenheim was never known to give signs of uneasiness but upon this occasion, who, till that moment, had considered all presages and omens, as the effects of melancholy and weakness. Some remarked too, that the battle of Leipzig might happen precisely the same day twelve months with the massacre at Pafwalk.

On the other hand, the king's troops were much elated some few minutes before the engagement, to see a bird, of so wild and timorous a nature as the ring-dove, perch itself on one of the royal standards: which trifling circumstance appeared to the Swedish soldiers as an incontestable omen of victory.

A decisive battle seemed now to be agreed upon, for great generals require but a single glance to comprehend each other's motions and intentions. This sort of military intuition is acquired by knowing precisely the abilities and interests of their adversary, and by a substitution of themselves in his place, with just so many wants, and such a degree of capacity, as he hath. Hence it is, that feints and false marches rarely alarm them, or draw them into a disagreeable situation. Be that as it will, Tilly was so circumstanced, as to excite one's compassion. He was now verging into his seventieth year, and in vain sought for himself in his own breast. The affair of Magdeburg hung heavy on his mind, and age had lessened his authority over the army. Pappenheim's appetite for danger forced him into perpetual hazards, and the petulant desire of fighting, right or wrong, in the younger officers, seemed tacitly to reproach him, either with the want of resolution, or with not being the hero he had once been. What emotions this general felt, under such circumstances, is beyond my ability to describe! He had never yet incurred a military disgrace, but, on the contrary, had been victorious in thirty six signal engagements and pitched battles. In a word, one of the greatest misfortunes, that can befall a general, is to outlive his prosperity, or carry on the military command when he is too old. Thus Alexander, prince of Parma, had died the most illustrious warrior of his age, if, after the fine performance of besieging Antwerp, he had bade farewell to war, as his friends advised him; since he made no considerable figure afterwards in the Low Countries, but, on the contrary, lost Zuthen, Deventer, Hulst, Nimeguen, Breda, &c. And such likewise was Tilly's unhappiness, having missed what Tacitus somewhere elegantly calls the opportunitatem mortis *. For now it was his destiny to have to do with a warrior, in whom the supreme command was invested without any reserve or defalcation of power; a hero vigilant, skilful, intrepid, in the very flower both of activity and judgment. And though the Imperial troops were the fiercest and best seasoned of any that Europe had seen till that time, many having served in the Low-country wars twenty years before, and more in Germany from the year 1618, and all in every battle, bating the fewest exceptions, invincible; yet there were reasons to dread a body of men, who (though to a relative degree novices in military practice) were sober, patient, and virtuous; better disciplined, clothed, and fed; bearing an entire submis-

1631. sion to their leaders, and placing an absolute confidence in him, who was moreover Tilly's superior in the management of artillery, and in the disposition and arrangement of his troops. All Europe stood gazing at this most interesting event; and when each of all these circumstances are combined together, can the reader be astonished, if poor old Tilly turned pale once or twice, when he saw the Swedish army advance to attack him, drawn up in the most beautiful array, and ranged upon principles to him then unknown, approaching slowly and silently, with that considerate determined countenance, which presages no good to the defendant?—And though some writers * invidiously mention the circumstance of Tilly's changing colour upon such a prospect, yet it is certain this discomposure arose not from fear, (as appears by his future conduct in the battle) but from conviction of the error, which the younger officers had drawn him into, and from the probability of setting the greatest share of military success, that perhaps any one man had ever possessed, upon the chance of a single die (that very chance not judiciously chosen) himself being so far advanced in years, that he could never hope to restore his character by any future services!

For these reasons, he wisely determined within himself, either to fortify his camp, or evade a battle; and the rather, as he expected Aldringer and Tieffenbach to join him with 12,000 experienced troops. But Pappenheim's impetuosity was irresistible, nor was it in his power, without totally losing the hearts of his army; to put in practise his favourite maxim, never to dip his foot in water, till he had made some experiment of the degree of cold; or, as other historians relate the saying, never to wade in a stream, except his eye-sight could command the bottom.

His first purpose in the council of war, held at the grave-digger's house, which appears to have been the best, (his private opinion being co-incident with his real interests and duty as a general) was to have maintained his original intrenchments, with the rich town of Leipzig at his elbow; from whence he might have drawn provisions in the same manner (having his own garrison in the town) as the king supported himself in the lines of Werben. During which interval, it is possible likewise, that the troops of Cologne might have arrived. Nor could he, in this camp, have extended his front in that imprudent manner, which he exhibited afterwards in the field of battle. He saw plainly too, that it was not his business to fight, except urged thereto by some extraordinary and almost irresistible necessity; for he well remembered the cruelty and outrages, which the Imperial army had committed, and concluded every peasant in an enemy's territory as an enlisted soldier against him, in case of a defeat. All the world knows, that ill success is doubly dangerous in an hostile country; and, what is yet more, he wanted nothing in the camp near Leipzig. It is thought too, winter being then on the point of approaching, that if he had evaded a battle, and entrenched himself wisely, the elector of Saxony would have been tired of his new guests long before the spring*. But Pappenheim, seemingly impeaching the courage of the generalissimo, touched his sensibility to the very quick, and induced him to relinquish his first camp; yet the old man still determined within himself, not to bring on a general engagement.

The self-same debate was resumed on the approach of Gustavus, and the new camp near Breitenfeld was protected with some extemporary intrenchments the day before the battle. Schomberg, and some of the elder officers, concurred with Tilly in the opinion of declining a general combat, if that were possible: but Pappenheim drew the count de Furstenberg, who aimed at succeeding Tilly, and the younger colonels into a contrary sentiment, and though the majority inclined to countenance the commander in chief, contrived by his great zeal the next day, to bring about that event in the field, which he had fruitlessly laboured to effect in a council of war †.

A fair campania spreads itself all round the side of Leipzig, where the Imperial general fixt his camp; but part thereof, as it was now the month of September, had been fresh-ploughed, being the very spot, according to some historians, (surnamed, if I mistake not, God's acre,) where Charles V. overthrew Frederic, elector of Saxony, and took him

1631. and Philip, landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, prisoners, divesting the former both of the duchy and the electorate.

The two armies being now within three miles of each other, his majesty the evening before the battle assembled all the generals, that served under him, and having ranged them round him in a circle on the midst of the plain, (for the Swedes slept that night in the open air) told them plainly, since he discovered a spirit of resolution in their countenances, That they were to fight with troops to-morrow of a different stamp from Polanders and Cossacks. Felice soldiers, said he, I shall not dissemble the danger; you will have a day's work, that is worthy of you. It is not my temper to diminish the merit of veteran troops like the Imperialists; but I know my officers at bottom, and scorn the thoughts of deceiving them. I foresee too, that our numbers will prove inferior to those of the enemy; but my friends, God is just,—AND REMEMBER MAGDEBURG *!

Some few minutes before, he made the tour of his army, and told every body of troops, with a peculiar cheerfulness on his countenance, what particular duties they were to perform the next day. He seemed most in pain for one large division of cavalry, the horsemen being unarmed, and the horses of a slight make; well knowing, that the Imperial cuirassiers, cloathed in iron from head to foot, and mounted upon beasts of a considerable bulk, would soon disunite them by the meer effort of squeezing. His advice therefore was to advance briskly up to the enemy without firing, and apply their sabres with an oblique sliding motion to their horses noses, heads, and necks. Thus, says he, the Imperial ranks will soon be broken, and the dismounted cavalier will find his armour too cumbersome to be enabled to molest you, during the remaining part of the engagement †: and what highly deserveth our observation, is, that the best commentator on the military life of Gustavus makes use of this very practice in the discipline of the Prussian cavalry. But be that as it will, the king flanked the aforesaid troops with good bodies of infantry, and interlined others amongst them at various intervals.

The elector of Brandenburg, for some private reasons, returned home 1631. the very day before the engagement. The king's army slept in battle array, on the bare ground; and the king himself passed the whole night in his coach, discoursing at intervals with Horn, Banier, and Teüffel, who fate with him. Immediately after the dawn of day the troops were formed, and each of the combined armies received orders to march, the Swedes making one column on the right, and the Saxons one on the left, each army amounting to about 15,000 men; the king having 7000 horse and 8000 foot, and the elector 11,000 infantry and 4000 cavalry*; the vanguard consisting of three regiments, two Scottish and one German, all conducted by Scots officers, namely, Sir James Ramsay, surnamed the Black, Sir John Hamilton, and Robert Monro, baron of Fowles. The troops, in order to distinguish one another, wore a small green branch on their heads. All historians agree, that the king dreamed in his coach, that he and Tilly engaged without arms, in the manner peasants are accustomed to fight; and in the morning he told his companions, that having thrown his adversary to the ground, he received a bite from him in his left breast; which was interpreted afterwards to signify the Saxon army, which advanced on the left hand of the Swedes.

There was a little rivulet, and a dirty swampy pass, where only a few men could march in front, at a small village called Schortza, which lay between the king and Tilly: but as the latter, not caring to draw on a general engagement, did not chuse to dispute it with all the vigour he was capable of exerting, (which hath been reckoned by some amongst one of the oversights of the day) the Swedish and Saxon armies soon cleared this pass, and when word was brought thereof to Tilly, he turned round to his soldiers, and said, Now, my old friends, we must look for blows.

About ten in the morning, his majesty cleared the difficulty at Schortza; and having examined Arnheim's plan of the disposition of the Saxon army, and made here and there a few interlineary remarks with his pen-

1631. cil, drew up his own army in complete battle-array, giving orders for placing his artillery in the most convenient situations, during the course of the engagement; paying little or no regard to the field-maréchals and serjeant-majors della battaglia, but leading up every brigade and column of troops himself, disposing them in their respective stations, and leaving general directions to their commanders. The king then rode up and down his own lines, and asked his men, with a chearful and animated countenance, if they felt a disposition within them to perform a hard day's service?—one universal vivat spread itself instantaneously through the army: upon which Gustavus, in order to keep his men in spirits, and humour the practice of the age, beckoned to a trumpeter, in sight of all the front of his troops, and taking something out of his pocket, bid him carry that little note to Tilly, for he wanted to speak with him. Tilly returned word back, promptly enough, that he was always ready to receive his majesty's commands, when notified by him: which looks as if he was determined not to fight, except upon compulsion; and thus ended the military ceremonial.

It was at this battle Gustavus put in practise the principal part of all those fine inventions in the military art, which he had meditated and reasoned upon a thousand times before. It is the inventive and creating power, which makes a man great in any science or profession; and in this light, our hero shone distinguished: for he exhibited to the public, in the course of one day's action, more knowledge in the tactical and fighting parts, and in that branch of war, which relates to artillery, than mankind had discovered from the times of the Romans, till the invention of gun-powder, and from that period, till the day's service at Leipsic.

And here I may observe once for all, that the king's inventive genius in war had made its appearance, in many instances, before this conjuncture. His grand ruling principle was, to make an enemy's country the seat of hostilities; the invaders being always supposed to undertake their business with greater spirit, and more determined resolution. He was the first, it is commonly thought, who intermixed the infantry amongst the horse: which, if I remember right, he practised in the very beginning of the Polish war; but as my authority for this assertion (which I discovered

REMARKS ON THE SUBJECT.

A complete Brigade, or Column, consisted of two Regiments, or 2016 Men, (though our Printer, by Mistake, Vol. II. p. 13, faith 2008.) It will be fuggled in the Course of the Work, that his Majesty made some Alterations, or Reformations, in the present Disposition; and if one may form Conjectures from the upright Drawings of Donbaertz and others, he pared away the 4 Divisions (comprehending 792 Men) that ranked behind the central Line underneath N^o I. dotted thus, - - - - whether for Convenience, or through Want of Forces, we cannot say. So that instead of the full, original Brigade, N^o I. It seems as if he reduced it more compactly into a Sout of Half-brigade, and then it contained 1224 Men. N^o II. He then, for which we have an authoritative Plan in the Swedish Discipline, [Lond. 4th. 1632.] split the full Brigade into four, calling every such Division a Battaglia, (from whence the Word Battalion unquestionably took its Rise) Each on a similar Principle with the Patent that gave it Birth, and containing each 504 Men, N^o III. and this is the Figure concerning which Felard, N^o IV. acquired a traditional, but imperfect Account; for the Curious will discover some remarkable Differences when they confront them minutely in the Plate beneath.

covered in some good author) hath escaped me, after various searchings and enquiries, I can only venture to present it to the reader upon the like footing it comes to me. For Mansfelt, at or near the same time, as hath been hinted elsewhere, had some idea of a similar practice; since in a famous picture of the battle of Prague, now in the possession of lord Chesterfield, (and which appears to me to be better painted than those, with which the house of Austria has decorated the pavilion in the star-park, where the main strokes of the action lay) something of this kind may be discovered in the arrangement of the troops. Gustavus likewise was the first, who reduced the musquets of the cavalry to carabines. He was dissatisfied also with the Imperial cuirassiers, who were completely clothed in armour from head to foot; and commanded his own men to carry only a breast-plate and a head-piece. He disfurnished the cavalry of their useless incumbrance of pikes; and ordered his soldiers (for the expression came first from him) never to give fire, till they could see their own image in the pupil of their enemy's eye *. He changed also into a pouch, which contained a certain number of cartridges, those senseless utensils called bandileers, which made a clattering in the time of action, and entangled themselves one with another; giving a military man the appearance of a High German rhymer, or an Italian zani. He ridiculed greatly the forked rests, used to support the musquets in giving fire; and when his officers, who had a secret itching to the continuance of old customs, made an attempt to content him by reducing the size and weight of those rests, so as to render them of a more manageable nature, he abolished them once for all by a supreme act of authority.

Yet an higher instance, not of the improving but inventive nature, remains behind: and though all the world talks much of the Leipzig-brigade, or column of Gustavus, (which latter word is not precisely agreeable to the original nature of the subject in question, which commenced only to become a term in vogue, towards the conclusion of the last century) yet I flatter myself, that there is no true and faithful delineation of this column extant, but what I here present to the reader, concerning whose authenticity no solid objection can ever be made. For

1631. lord Rea, who drew it, was one of the king's favourite colonels, and the draught is so precisely exact and minute, that a letter of the alphabet is placed for every single man; and the post of each officer may be assigned and ascertained to the distance of a foot square. Indeed the intervals between corps and corps in the original are unduly wide and spacious; but his lordship found himself obliged to reserve these vacancies, in order to insert the letters, which denote the position of each particular commander. Yet, as I observed before, the word column is not the proper expression, whereby to denominate the Leipzig brigade, except we comprehend it in the sense and configuration, into which Folard supposes Gustavus to have improved it, before he fought the battle of Lutzen, for which I can produce neither authority, nor corroborating proof. But conformably to lord Rea's drawing, the portion of the cross A B makes properly the impulsive column of attack in the Leipzig brigade; but as the allineated parts (I am here referring to the plate preceding) C D E G F, and the supporting strengths behind marked with H I K and L, all acted and defended themselves upon one principle, in case either of assailing, or being flanked, or entirely surrounded; and as, I say, they all acted by the same impulsive force, and received the same impression and undulation, it seems to me but reasonable to consider the whole together in the light of one body, which henceforwards, with the reader's permission, we will surname a column, since the word brigade corresponds now with another idea.

As his majesty of Sweden was an original genius in the art of war, and the first officer in the world with regard to infantry, it may be necessary here to say something still more at large concerning his inventive and perfective talents in this day's disposition. Having thoroughly contemplated the tactical institutions of the ancients, and observed from experience the imminent danger, that threatens thin unconnected extensions of troops, when once they fall into a state of undulation, (than which no worse symptom can make its appearance in the day of battle) he figured to himself, that a new cast might be given to the old cuneus and caput porcinum; or, in other words, that a sort of cross, of which the portions A B strictly speaking made the column, supported behind and on each side by deep lines of troops, who could throw themselves into a square in case of being surrounded; was on the one hand less subject to danger from the adversary's fire, and on the other hand more proper to penetrate by reason of its figure and pressure, being capable to divide into two sections, or dilate itself in any proportion whenever victory began to declare. It may be objected indeed, that the front-fire of such a column (for I still venture to use the term, though unknown to Gustavus) is very narrow: but then the chance of receiving wounds from the enemy is contracted likewise: and when troops are near, and the ground even, the fire of small arms constitutes not the point decisive. Nevertheless, without wandering from the subject before me, the combinations or groups of musqueteers E and G made a discharge nearly equal to that, which opposed them. In a word, if there were any, the smallest difference to the disadvantage of the Swedes at first fight, yet the invention of the column more than doubly counterbalanced it, when matters once approached towards the moments of decision. And when we speak of pikemen and pikes in this disposition of Gustavus, we mean not that sort of instrument, with which ancient arsenals are usually garnished, a military implement, which importeth contradictions, being both weak and unweildly at the same time, with a small infirm head, and of length immeasurable. But what we intend is the pike, which the king actually invented *, more managable by many degrees than the bayonet, (if we consider the thickness, weight, distorted figure and clumsiness of the musquet, to which it is affixed) and more effectual at least by one third, as performing its duty with greater agility, before the other can dispute therewith.

Many good judges have preferred the pikes of Gustavus to the bayonet of the moderns, and particularly the marechal de Saxe †, and the chevalier de Folard ‡. We shall therefore conclude this paragraph with apo-

* By all I remember to have seen, it was about eleven feet long, comprehending two feet for the head of the socket that fixed it. The head was made of the finest tempered steel, that could be procured; it pierced or cut with equal sharpness, the breadth of the blade being about four inches and a half in its lowermost dimensions.

1631. logizing thus far at least, that as the method, which decideth victory soonest, is, generally speaking, the least sanguinary and cruel, we hope to obtain the reader's pardon for bringing to light a system of practice like the Leipzig column, so long disused, if not totally forgotten. Nor ought one to compose the life of Gustavus, and overlook that great man in the character of a field-officer.

But to return to the subject before me; the evolutions of the brigade or column were so few and simple, that supposing the noise and confusion of battle to be ever so great, yet it is next to impossible, that the meanest soldier could be puzzled in his duty for the space of an instant. We will imagine this corps, for the sake of theory, to be attacked at once in front and in the rear: with a motion equally rapid as thought itself, the rear stands prepared on similar principles with the front, protected alike (though not in the self-same disposition) with musqueteers and pikemen; presenting an impenetrable depth of thirty files. And to make the supposition bear still harder, we will form an idea of beholding the flanks attacked, and the whole corps environed by enemies at once. Yet even in this case, by no difficult evolution, the bodies G and F, D and E confront the assailants, and the files are thirty deep, as we observed before. So that in the former instance, you attack an amphibena, which presents an head at either end, and in the latter instance, undertake to seize a bunch of thorns, which will give you a wound in whatever part you propose to grasp it.

Nor Upon this principle of arrangement is it reduced to that ridiculous composition called the hollow-square, which when once penetrated (and nothing can be easier than such an undertaking) becomes disparted forever beyond the possibility of a future re-union; resembling no more the brigade of Gustavus, than a square box of oaken boards preserves the properties of a cube of marble of like dimensions, either in solidity or resistance. What therefore is to be done with this intractable piece of military machinery, which performs with uniformity its intended progress? The narrowness of its front, supported by the weight of its basis, must pervade and disunite the body that stands before it; and that being once broken, it can dilate itself ad libitum in a few moments.

On

* On the other hand, if the brigade in question should chance to be 1631.
 furrounded, (a circumstance of ill success more likely to happen to any other configuration of troops in equal numbers,) it hath the power of contracting itself suddenly into a mass still more solid; on which the attempts of cavalry (supposing the brigade to perform its duty, since otherwise all reasonings fall to the ground) will appear to be little less than a bold and rash experiment of danger: for the depth of the ranks, the resistance of the king's reformed pikes, (a sort of instrument far more manageable than the bayonet, and more efficacious,) and the fierce discharge of musquetry at a few paces distance are difficulties which neither man nor horse will attempt frequently to surmount: since the solidity of the body we are describing, and the fortunate configuration and contexture of its parts are of such a nature that they cannot easily be thrown into a total disorder; and as the mortal presage of military dissolution is the waving and floating of a body of troops backwards and forwards at considerable interstices;---Thus on the other hand this corps of Gustavus is so solidly compacted, and so judiciously incorporated and connected, that though it may admit now and then a slight undulation, yet as it happeneth to a well-timbered mansion in the common concussions of an earthquake, it receives the impression, and returns back to its original concatenation of parts in a few moments.

In a word, nothing can greatly disturb the column of Gustavus but marching point-blank against a battery of cannon. This the general must avoid as much as he can in the field-disposition of his day's service: and if the men are necessitated to advance upon such a hazardous undertaking, they must proceed as rapidly as may be consistent with regularity and good order. And here the column hath some advantage from its natural configuration. Its narrowness of front (provided we mean the last-invented sort, which consisted of 504 men, and was surnamed a battaglia;) is no disparaging circumstance on the one hand; and on the other hand, its power of approaching by an oblique line, instead of a direct one, is a peculiar felicity which merits our attention: each sort of motion being equally congenial to the nature of this body †; which, in one word, nothing can easily overcome but another of the same configuration and conducted better. Not but that various objections may be made to this disposition

1631. disposition of the king of Sweden, and many improvements may be thereto added; for we are not declaiming on the subject with the enthusiasm of Foulard; since many beautiful theories deceive us greatly when realized by practice. Therefore all we contend for is, that the idea in its first conception was great and new.

The plain, on which the battle was fought, extends itself in a line almost all through Misnia, and even in a clear day it is hardly possible to distinguish a mountain in the whole neighbourhood around it; since at most it is only diversified here and there with small elevations and declivities. As the combined armies proposed to act the part of aggressors, the Imperial general had the choice of the ground. Of course he occupied the slope of a gently rising hill to the south-west of Podelwitz, which extended itself near two miles; foreseeing, as the conflict could hardly become serious till after mid-day, that he should have the advantage of the sun, a matter then supposed to be of great consequence in the art of war. He had the good fortune also, according to the estimation of those times, to gain the wind right in his favour; for, as it blew that day extremely brisk, it conveyed the smoke and dust, which was abundant, directly from him: and in those times generals were so fond of these advantages, that very often they shifted their troops in the heat of action (which sort of movements, by the way, are extremely dangerous) in order to gain a point of wind and sun. Gustavus was in no degree dismayed to see these little fortuitous advantages snatched from him: nevertheless, it must not be dissembled, that he knew the convenience of this elevated slope, and the wood behind it, as well as his adversary, who lay near it, and had ordered an advanced party to occupy it by all possible means; but in that attempt the Imperial general prevented him: for he possessed the post one day before the battle. Nor could Gustavus make greater expedition than he did after signing the treaty with the elector of Saxony, for he marched thirty miles in a day and an half, and fought his enemy the afternoon of the second day. It is true the Swedish dragoons made a desperate attack upon the spot of ground in question, but were obliged to desist, when they saw the whole army of the Imperialists prepared to pour upon them, and cut them to pieces*. Here Tilly entrenched his Walloon infantry, having planted two large batteries, consisting of forty pieces of heavy artillery, on the summit of the rising slope behind him at very considerable distances: for one fronted the right wing of the Swedes in a direct line, (where he concluded the king would command, that being with him, for reasons to me unknown, the post of honour, and the place where he affected to plant himself, as he did afterwards at the battle of Lutzen) and the other, being advanced forwarder, according to the natural turn of the hill, cut through the Saxon and Swedish army obliquely. Behind him lay a large wood, which he proposed for a rallying place in case of a defeat. His army consisted of 44,000 fighting men, and the enemy produced only three fourths of that number to oppose him. His watch word was Jesu Maria, the same he had used at Magdeburg; and his men, in imitation of their former practice in storming that town, wore white ribbands on their hats and helmets, and white strings round their right arms: that of the Swedes was Emanuel, or God with us, which was always carried inscribed on the colours. They wore green branches on their hats and helmets. The Imperial general followed the old discipline, which he had learnt in the Low-country wars, of drawing up his men in great square bodies, which in part contributed to his ruin. Not that the discipline was then bad, but the dispositions of Gustavus were still better. Two high ways passed through the field of battle, but as they went upon the same lines, by which the combined army advanced, the convenience and inconveniency of them were just reciprocal to either party.

Tilly, who formed his main battle and the two wings into three separate armies, making only one mighty front, which reached from Sohausen to Lindenthal, (a vastness of extent hardly to be believed*) rejecting the assistances of a second line and corps de reserve, posted himself on the eminence above-mentioned, with the wood behind him.

* It was, faith Monro, two English miles in length, Part ii.

1631. and Arnheim conducted the main body. Yet to shew that prince's parts, and Arnheim's invidious temper, the troops were drawn up nearly upon the same principle with the Imperialists. The king made some objections to this disposition; but the Saxon general, who had passed his apprenticeship under Walstein, chose rather to abide by the more received and established forms.

Such, as had a talent for war, soon perceived a manifest superiority between the arrangement of the king's troops and those under Tilly's command: for the latter were as much beaten by dint of genius as by valour. It was the custom of the best generals before this engagement to draw up their forces in huge square bodies, which they called tertia's; the very unweildiness of which massy combination helped to destroy them: for upon any remarkable confusion each man overturned his neighbour, and when the whole corps was squeezed into one jumble or chaos, no officers could move from place to place, nor reduce the men into their pristine order. Whereas the king's army was intersected and divided into numberless straight lines and avenues, some greater and some smaller, like the uniform ground-plot of a regular city or parterre: and the troops could advance, retreat, or make motions from side to side, just as if they were moving in a defile between two hedges or walls. Thus the whole army was one complicated, but unperplexed machine, consisting of innumerable handfuls or peletons of men, all little systems by themselves, all acting under a chieftain of their own, yet all contributing to the grand establishment of the whole together. By these means, and by the promptness and facility of locomotion, he brought more hands to act than the enemy possibly could; and though his men might be killed, yet, scientifically speaking, they could not well be routed, for help was ever at hand, and the destruction of one part did not necessarily involve the destruction of another. Add to all this, that the directions of the general had always free passage, as the blood is poured first from the heart, and then regularly dispersed, not only through arteries and veins, but even through the smallest capillaries. And by way of proof how much this grand invention avoided confusion in the very first experiment, only one regiment amongst all the royal forces was squeezed out of its place, and that was Collenbach's regiment of horse. 1631.

This reducing an army to one piece of machinery in the day of battle was the vis vivida, the distinguishing individuating principle of Gustavus's creative genius. Nevertheless, he displayed his talents in exhibiting many collateral military inventions in the transaction of Leipzig, which deserve highly to be mentioned by an exact historian. He found wonderfully good effects, from mixing his musqueteers amongst the horse, as also from flanking the horse with musqueteers: since upon the principles of his plan, there were always openings for them to retreat, in case they were in danger of being overpowered. And at that time of day, the fire of the musquets (whose calibre was larger than at present) produced a dreadful disorder amongst the cavalry, who could hardly approach in these circumstances so as to bring their pistols to take effect; and as the horsemen then wore armour pistol-proof, they advanced up to their enemies with absolute unconcern: but the musquet-balls oftentimes pierced their armour through and through, and always made contusions, which were very painful and inconvenient. Tilly received one in this very battle, which tormented him more than all his wounds, and in his flight was obliged to send for the town-surgeon at Halle, who cut out all the bruised flesh; and Gustavus lost his life from the effects of another; for on the day of the battle of Lutzen he determined to fight in his common wearing apparel (an elk-skin wastecoat excepted) having lately received a contusion in his shoulder, which rendered the least wrench of his cuirass insupportable.

This was also the first time, that any general had ventured to thin the depth of his files, which the king reduced to six deep, (the brigades or columns excepted;) whereas the Imperialists, though drawn up in one front only, opposed him with trebly the same number at least. It was objected to his majesty, that so insubstantial a body of men could not resist a very ponderous impression; but his answer was, (for it must be remembered he fought upon two lines, not to mention the bodies of reserve)

1631. ferve) that upon his principle, passages were always open for new troops to approach and sustain their companions ; that he could stop a leak in his army with as much ease as a sea-captain could prevent the ill effects of one in his ship, and that the power of bringing more hands to act abundantly, counterbalanced the plausibility of the objection. His field-artillery, made of hardened leather, rendered him also excellent service, being so very portable, that he could remove a little battery, or make a new one in ten minutes time, or advance it occasionally before his troops, here and there, just when a fresh attack was forming against him. Here too for the first time, excepting in reviews, was practised in good earnest the method of firing in platoons. In a word, nothing of consequence escaped Gustavus in the whole system of the fighting part from the battle of Leipzig till the present hour, except the invention of the bayonet, which probably was overlooked by a searching and speculative genius, merely because it was simple and obvious. Though many are of opinion *, that something between the pike and the partizan might be invented, which would prove more useful in repulsing the cavalry. Now it is highly natural to imagine, that Gustavus knew this: for he shortened the handle, and varied the figure of the head of the pike, conformably to the idea I have just mentioned †.

But to return to the battle itself. Tilly upon this occasion made some mistakes as a general, which may properly be called his own, and some he was ensnared into by the petulance and impetuosity of younger men. As to the latter, I have, and shall explain myself more fully concerning them in their respective places, remarking here (in addition to some oversights of the Imperial commander already specified) that he was worse served with intelligence than he ought to have been, even in an enemy's country ; for his Swedish majesty approached him unexpectedly ‡ ; from whence it happened, that no contemptible body of troops was employed in foraging at a distance not to be recalled in time convenient, and that Holk with a considerable party had been detached to make conquests about

Naumburg*. Tilly did ill likewise not to order an army, that lay idle in Silesia, to have attacked the electorate on that side, which would have incapacitated half the Saxon forces from joining Gustavus. It may be observed further, that when Pappenheim violated his orders, and forced him to descend from his eminence, his presence of mind (which was discomposed doubtless by so vexatious an incident) seems to have deserted him a few minutes; for being compelled first by teasing and artifice, and then by dint of necessity, to make a sacrifice of his prudence and judgment, he commanded his troops to advance with so much ardour and confusion, that the best and most proper regiments were not placed in their respective situations, excepting only the regiments of Piccolomini, Schomberg, and Cronenberg, which were esteemed the flower of the Imperial cavalry. In a word, Tilly was too old for his employment.

In consequence of this precipitate measure, the main body, which even at this time was not distinctly formed, made an irregular advance; for the cavalry destined to support it received no orders to keep pace with the infantry. Now to understand this passage the better, the reader must be informed, that the center was sustained by six regiments of horse, which had no connexion with the wings of the army. From hence it likewise followed, that there was no time to appoint a proper body of reserve; nor were any infantry interspersed among the cavalry. The best troops opposed the new raised Saxons, which may be considered as an extraordinary oversight †. “I asked several commanders,” saith one who was an eye-witness of the battle, “if they knew their instructions; but by their answers it appeared they had none. Seemingly to me the hope was, that God would work miracles in proportion to the errors we had committed.” Yet Pappenheim, as maréchal of the field, made the disposition of the battle: and when it was told him, that his own wing was too weak in itself, and unsupported likewise by any reserve, his answer was, that he had taken care to provide a re-1631. inforcement ; whether truly or not cannot be ascertained ; yet sure it is, that no re-inforcement ever appeared.

The last error, which in truth may be considered as a misfortune, was, that Furstenberg, who kept an intelligence with Pappenheim, but wanted the impetuosity of that commander, disliked the orders of the generalissimo, yet wanted resolution to disobey them. Nevertheless, chance brought about what he privately wished to see effected ; for an old colonel at length told him, that he would commence hostilities without his concurrence. This rash departure from instructions in either wing compelled Tilly to descend from his eminence ; for if Furstenberg had not engaged, it is more than probable Tilly would have consigned Pappenheim to the mercy of Gustavus : but perceiving the battle to thicken round him, and dreading the reproaches of sacrificing the better part of the Imperial army (for the public always favours the precipitate combatants right or wrong) he at length determined to order his main-body of infantry to advance, which consisted of 8000 troops till then supposed to be invincible, and which in truth might have effected wonders, if the cavalry, which belonged to them, had received commands to march forwards and support them : but that circumstance, in the hurry of the determination, happened totally to be forgotten.

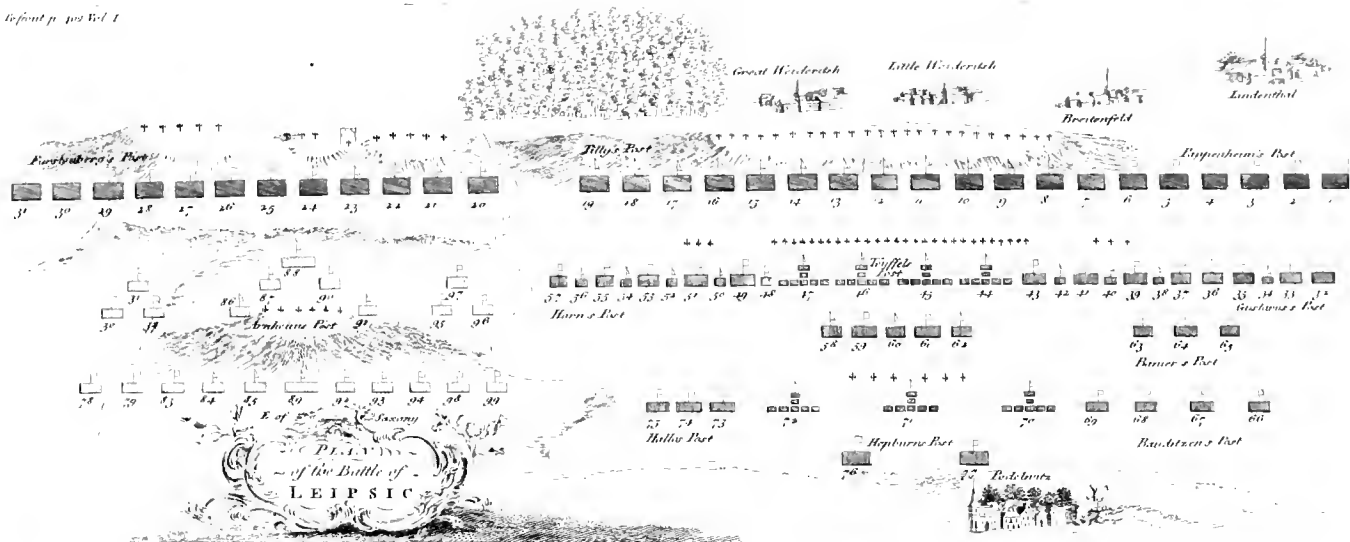

Having thus sketched out the previous ideas necessary for the comprehension of one of the most important battles, which the world had then seen, I may by this time (and perhaps with little difficulty) obtain my reader's permission to enter into a distinct description of the action itself ; inasmuch as the plan here annexed will give a more distinct idea of the field-dispositions than can be described in words.

This battle was fought on Wednesday the seventh of September, which day the Germans call dies reginæ. The front of each army extended itself near two English miles in breadth. Many old officers declared, that the mighty contest, at the white mountain near Prague in 1620, was but a sort of pantomime in comparison to this *. As the intermingled musqueteers carried no colours, the Imperialists did not

SWEDISH ARMY.

An exact Plan of the Battle of Leipsic is a Thing greatly to be wished for, inasmuch as his Svedisch Majesty that Day exhibited to the public an Art of War entirely new and thoroughly scientific.

Folard's Ichnography illustrates in no Degree the important Truths I am mentioning; since the Size of his Squares bears not any Proportion to the Number of Troops contained in them, and the Ground itself is partly imaginary. Horfe from Foot we do not know: (an Inaccuracy to be remarked in most plans) besides, without a just Idea of the precise Quantity of Men in each Peloton, and in what Places the Infantry were intermingled with the Cavalry, it is impossible to comprehend the fine Disposition then made by Gissarus, who added more to the Art of War in this Day's Service, than had been discovered since the Time of Julius Cæsar.

discover them till it was too late. Tilly had the advantage of ground, wind, and sun *; but Gustavus performed great things with his artillery, and exceeded the Austrian general, who piqued himself particularly in that respect. But the victory was principally owing to the easy shifting and quick discharge of the new-invented leathern cannon, and the intermingled musqueteers, whose fire was too heavy and violent to be opposed by the pistol-shots of cavalry. It was likewise enjoined the Swedes first to receive the enemy's discharge, and afterwards return it †.

Tilly exceeded the two combined armies by ten or twelve thousand men at least ‡; so saith Monro, who was then present; but our computation (which we profess to have rated very low) makes the superiority about five thousand: yet the whole Saxon army fled, excepting only their master's guards, and one other regiment. Nevertheless, his majesty obtained the victory at the head of two and twenty thousand men, and, what is very remarkable, not a Swedish soldier behaved ill, and only one regiment was squeezed out of its place, and that was Callenbach's; whereas, on the other hand, the four Walloon bodies, that retired at last to the wood, had been posted at considerable distances one from the other ||.

After a furious cannonading of no inconsiderable duration, the king, cloathed in a new suit of grey cloth, wearing a green plumage on his beavor, and mounted on a horse de poil d'étourneau §, began the attack on Pappenheim sword in hand, and after a desperate resistance from that

§ We cannot express this phrase in English but by a term unbecoming the dignity of history, for an horse de poil d'étourneau signifies what the grooms in their vulgar idiom call a sea-bitten colour. Now it was certainly a false affectation in his majesty, (and in that respect Pappenheim copied him) either from a contempt of danger, or in order to be better discerned by his troops, ever to ride a steed, which carried some distinguishing marks; as may be observed not only here, but at the siege of Ingoldstadt, and the fatal battle of Lutzen. And it was probably on this account, that the artful Richelieu and father Joseph sent an horse to be sold in the Swedish camp very uncommonly marked. Conformably to what they divined, his majesty purchased it in a moment; but as Gassion stood then high in his favour, he bestowed it on him, and the said horse was killed under the Frenchman in the next day's cannonading. Mem. de Gassion par M. le Pure, 12. Tom. i. 110, 111.

1631. intrepid and most experienced commander, compelled him to retreat to such a distance, as procured a point of the wind in his majesty's favour. What induced the king to push forwards this onset with a degree of fury, that can hardly be paralleled, was partly to avoid the wind and dust, which were both perplexing that day beyond imagination; and partly to secure the left flank of his wing (N^o 41, &c.) from Tilly's enormous battery, which pierced it obliquely*.

This advance of the Swedes caused a larger opening than appeared at first, between the king's line, and the corps posted behind him under the direction of Banier; and of course the brave duke of Holstein (whose regiment of foot stands described in the plan N^o 7.) at the extremity of Tilly's main body, and flanking Pappenheim's wing of cavalry, made a motion, it is thought, from his own determination, and quitting his line of battle, fell furiously on the king's rear: but as a part of his majesty's corps faced about immediately, and as Banier, who supported his master at a proper interval of distance, advanced with three divisions of the Rhingrave's horse, the Imperial regiment was soon cut to pieces, and the duke of Holstein mortally wounded.

Pappenheim being thus forced out of his line, edged round to the king's right flank; but Gustavus soon made proper evolutions to confront him, and Banier having by this time slaughtered the duke of Holstein's regiment, co-operated vigorously with his royal master; so that thenceforwards the Imperial left wing acquitted itself manfully, yet never turned the scale against the army of Sweden. Nevertheless, Pappenheim returned to the charge seven times successively; but in the third attack, which was conducted with amazing readiness and impetuosity, missed but little of overpowering his opponents; for he was quicker in rallying, than the Swedes could be in pursuing their advantage; so that Banier was obliged to fly once more to his monarch's succour, and the re-inforcement was as roughly handled as the party, to whose assistance it marched. And it was in the fury of this rencounter that Pappenheim and Gassion engaged in single combat †.

* Soldat Suedois, 128.

About fifteen minutes after Pappenheim's first attack began, the count de Furstenberg became the aggressor on the Saxon army, and after a short conflict dispersed entirely the right wing, which part of his troops pursued in an unsoldier-like manner with undue earnestness. Now the occasion of this sudden defeat may be attributed purely to the inexperience and pusillanimity of the provincial horse, which had been raised by vassals*. Nevertheless, indecisive as this slight advantage may appear, it tempted Tilly to dispatch a part of his main body to overwhelm the residue of the Saxon forces, and induced him likewise, (which may be considered as an indiscretion †) to descend from his convenient and well chosen eminence, and let loose on Horn (who commanded the left wing of the Swedish army) a part of those veteran bands of infantry, which had made all Germany tremble for the space of thirteen years. The Imperial generalissimo soon dispersed the Saxon forces, and when his troops appeared over-eager in pursuing the fugitives, Turn back, said he, my comrades; let us beat the Swedes, and the empire is our own. Yet he could never recover so many pursuers, as it is questionless he wished to recall. Mean while the Saxons, like excellent soldiers, took the liberty to plunder their own waggons, and then by flight consulted their safety. Their electoral master was the first man, who carried the news of the defeat to Eülenburg ‡, a little town on the banks of the Molda, about ten miles from the field of action. Arnheim having saved two (or as some say four) regiments, and placed them under Horn's protection, flew immediately to the king to implore his advice and assistance ||. Yet all the Imperialists concerned pursued not the Saxons; for Furstenberg, with his Italian cavalry, and Cronenberg, whose regiment of German horse was esteemed the very flower of the Austrian army, stopped their troops in full career, and attacked Horn, who soon made proper evolutions, and received them so bravely, that Gustavus ever afterwards acknowledged the victory to be due to him. Tilly likewise bent a part of his efforts on this left wing of the Swedes, which by the flight of 1631. the Saxons was rendered naked for a season in one flank, yet it was protected a little with an high road and hedges ; which Gustavus probably foresaw in the first dispositions he made, and consequently destined them as a small line of partition between his own and the electoral forces.

And here it may naturally be asked, what cogent reason could induce Tilly to decline attacking the main-body of the royal army conducted by Teüffel ? To which may be assigned a very just and satisfactory answer : namely, that the centre was protected, as will appear by the plan, with one entire line of large artillery *.

Mean while Gustavus, who had greatly checked the impetuosity of Pappenheim, and who, foreseeing his presence might be necessary in more places than one, had made Banier provisionally substitute-commander over the right wing, receiving advice upon advice of the misbehaviour and defeat of the Saxons, sent a message to Teüffel to lead the centre † on the charge ; but that brave officer was struck dead by a musquet-ball as he was listening attentively to the royal message ‡. His majesty, unapprized of this event, pursued his course down the interval behind the front-line, crying out with an air of sprightliness in his countenance as he rode along, alegramente, my soldiers, alegramente : to which the troops replied with alacrity, vivat ! vivat ! At the same time, with a view to strengthen Horn's flank, he ordered the foot regiment of Hepburn, and half that of Vitzdum ||, to march from the rear of the centre § : as likewise the regiment of Westergothian horse from his own wing (N^o 39.) having cut to pieces the regiment that confronted it ; namely, Holstein's (N^o 7.) and pretty well rebated the edge of Pappenheim's violence.

Being arrived in that part of Horn's wing * where Callenbach commanded, he cried out with a tone of eagerness, Callenbach, charge man in God's name! Charge man in God's name! That officer soon obeyed the royal orders, but fell unfortunately in the first fire. 1631.

Mean while the king, notwithstanding the clouds of dust, that molested him, discovered some large masses of troops, that seemed to advance. He asked the persons round him what they might conjecture concerning them? their answer was, they concluded them to be Swedes. But Gustavus knew, that this could bear no reference to his own plan, and galloping his horse at some distance beyond the lines (for his eyesight was by no means the most perfect) returned and arranged his troops in order to receive them: They are Imperialists, added he, I have discovered the Burgundian † crests amongst their ensigns. This said, he returned to such places where he thought this presence most indispensably necessary. And here it was; namely, in the sharp conflict betwixt Horn and Tilly, that the Scottish regiments first exhibited the practice of firing in platoons ‡, which amazed the Imperialists to such a degree, that they hardly knew how to conduct themselves.

Yet still the main body of the Swedes, as we observed before, and the major part of Tilly's Walloon infantry, which confronted them, remained spectators on each other, if we except only their cannonading, and the detachment of certain bodies from themselves occasionally, as urgent necessities here and there seemed to demand such sorts of assistance.

And now, that is to say, some few minutes after four, the king perceived matters to approach towards a favourable conclusion: for, having squeezed Pappenheim quite out of his place, and advanced half way towards the village of Little Weideriteh, he judged it expedient to attack from all quarters that great mass of Imperial Infantry, which com-

Here a series of obstinacy made its appearance between the victorious and the vanquished, that can hardly be described *; for the approach of evening rendered all relators (even such as were present) indistinct in their best accounts. However, it is natural to suppose, that the king brought his whole centre to act in conjunction with such other forces as he could then produce †.

The darkness of night began now to obscure the sky ‡, and after the Imperialists had been pierced through and through various times, so stubborn and persevering was the resistance they made, that the victory hardly yet appeared to be finally decisive; for four regiments of infantry, though posted at considerable distances from each other ||, formed themselves merely by the habitude and instinct of war, and without the assistance of any one principal commander, retired gloomily and sullenly to the skirts of the wood behind them. There they repulsed the united efforts of the Swedes without ever mentioning the word quarter, and continued to resist even when half-disabled, and prostrated on the earth. It is certain, that Tilly behaved with great intrepidity to the last moment §, and burst out into tears, when he saw the massacre his soldiers submitted to with patience . At length, under the protection of darkness, the valiant Cronenberg carried him off at the head of these unconquerable Walloons, who were reduced now to 600 men. The battle lasted (not to mention the cannonading) from twelve at noon till after six; and for the first two hours of close engagement the victory was doubtful ††.

On the other side was engraven the word JEHOVAH, half concealed beneath clouds that intermix themselves with sun-shine, and this lemma underneath; A. DOMINO. FACTUM. EST. ISTUD *.

There was a circumstance preceding this battle, that explains Tilly's conduct, and which few historians seem to know. As the Imperial general, far from being the aggressor, had determined not to fight, except compelled by inevitable necessity; how happened it, that he engaged in the manner all writers mention, when Pappenheim had no power to prescribe laws unto him? I always knew there was some omission of history in this important point; and though the true reason occurred to me from the natural result of probabilities, yet I did not care to hazard my conjectures till I could ground them upon some substantial authority †. Now the reader may remember, that if Tilly had chosen to fight, he ought above all things to have disputed the swampy pass at Scholka ‡. This employment Pappenheim ardently fought for, but Tilly gave him an absolute denial; nevertheless, being of a nature very abhorrent from all arbitrary acts, he consented, after repeated solicitations, to allow Pappenheim, at his own pressing request, and under strict promise of not engaging in earnest, to observe the numbers and countenance of the enemies as they passed the rivulet, allotting him only 2000 cavalry for that service, and protesting, that even such a concession was highly blameable in any supreme commander.

But Pappenheim's appetite for glory, joined to the natural impetuosity of his temper, soon brought on a very dangerous skirmish; inso-much, that he was obliged at length to inform the generalissimo, that if

In this perplexity, which from its sudden appearance hardly admitted of any alternative, Tilly had no time for liberty of choice ; and as the clamour and insinuations of the younger officers almost distracted him, he judged wrong merely for present ease ; nevertheless wanted not spirit to charge the colonel, who commanded the reinforcement, to tell Pappenheim, that in case he failed to disengage himself at all events, he must expect to lay down his life as a sacrifice for his temerity and disobedience, in a solemn trial before a court-martial. Yet the old man soon forgave this impetuous ardour, which was congenial to the temper of his lieutenant-general, and in a letter he wrote, under all supposable anguish of mind, not more than sixteen days after the defeat, allows not the remotest hint to fall from his pen to the disadvantage of Pappenheim. It is a letter worth reading, as a pattern of Christian resignation in a great commander, who had never met with a repulse during the course of thirty very signal engagements. At Halle in Saxony, Sept. 13, 1631.

“ GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS.”

Tilly left 7000 men dead in the field ; but the number of slain does not always constitute the real loss, that attends a defeat. Men may be procured and purchased again : but the loss of such a number of veteran troops, infantry especially, is never to be recovered during an old general's life. Few people extend this remark through military history, though the consequences are, humanly speaking, infallible. The emperor half over-turned his fortunes just before Gustavus arrived, by disbanding a body of 17,000 well seasoned and experienced troops, with a view to please the diet at Ratisbon ; and Spain afterwards received a mortal wound by losing that respectable body of Walloons at the battle of Rocroy † ; nor had she recovered her loss even at the time when the peace of Munster was concluded.

Next morning the general, (who had been afflicted with the gout) was found dead in his arm-chair at the head of his soldiers, who lay all stretched round him in regular lines, covering the same ground, which they had occupied whilst alive.

‡ The court of Vienna sustained another loss of this kind soon after the peace of Utrecht, being induced from arguments of œconomy to dismiss about 18,000 troops, which had distinguished themselves through the war of the succession. Prince Eugene made remonstrance after remonstrance, and condescended even to intercede and supplicate for their continuance ; but receiving in a private audience a positive denial from the emperor, he left the cabinet with great emotion, and shed tears on the occasion.

1631. consequences of this defeat, the Imperialists lost more men under the article of prisoners than in the action itself; for out of forty thousand effective foldiers, according to their computation, the general of the league, by Pappenheim's confession, preserved no more than one half. Great numbers of the enemy took the opportunity to desert a sinking cause; 3000 persons were taken prisoners in the day of battle, to whom the king granted quarter without the effusion of a drop of blood; some were likewise killed in their flight; for Gustavus pursued the Imperialists eight and thirty miles, and at Mersburg particularly destroyed a 1000 more, and compelled 1500 to surrender.

The camp of the enemy was taken standing, so that the officers and foldiers lost great part of their ill-acquired plunder. In a word, there was hardly a foldier amongst the killed or prisoners, who had less than ten ducats in his pockets, and more was still found concealed in their girdles and in their saddles. Almost all the baggage-waggons fell likewise into the hands of the Swedes, as also 100 ensigns and cornets, and more than two thirds of the train of artillery. It pleased the victors to find many of the latter, inscribed with the names, or decorated with the arms of their friends and enemies; as of the king of Bohemia, elector of Brandenburg, and duke of Brunswick on the one hand, and of the dukes of Bavaria and Fridland, as also of his Imperial majesty, on the other hand. The king divided the spoils of Tilly's camp amongst his men in a manner remarkably equitable and uncommon: for, being apprized of the lodgment and disposition of the enemy's troops, he appointed each Swedish regiment to occupy the same ground, which an Imperial regiment had possessed before; and no man was allowed to plunder out of his own appointed district, under the severest military pains and penalties*.

The Swedes, who behaved well, lost only 1000 men in this engagement; and the Saxons, who faced the enemy only a few minutes, verified the old observation, for their loss amounted to at least 2000. Amongst the dead on the Imperial side, may be reckoned Adolphus duke of Holstein, who expired some few hours after he was taken*: he was a protestant; serjeant-major general Schoenberg, watch-master general Erwitz, Baumgarten general of the artillery, the colonels Blancard and Coloredo, Lerma aid de camp, and the marquis of Gonzaga, the lieutenant-colonels, the baron de Grotta, Caratelli, and don Joseph de Ainsa (who commanded the regiment of Savelli in the duke's absence): adjutant-general Zinzendorf, and the commissary-generals Walmerode and Graff, were taken prisoners; as were also then, and a few days afterwards, at Leipzig and Halle, Coronini, Cratz, and six other colonels, together with Bernardi, secretary and treasurer to Tilly, and several ecclesiastics, who were immediately dismissed without ransom. Amongst the Swedes were killed Maximilian Teüffel †, who commanded the royal regiment of foot-guards, Hall, Collenbach, Aldergast, and Damitz, all colonels. Courville was taken prisoner, for having received a glancing shot across the forehead, and being blinded with the blood, that streamed down upon his eyes, he mixt among the enemy's troops without knowing them. Colonel Lumfidel, and lieutenant-colonel Mostyn, were both wounded. Meanwhile the elector of Saxony lost serjeant-major general Bindhauf, Loëfel, Dieskau, the two Starchedels, and some other colonels.

Tilly received (some say) three wounds from musquet-balls and pistol-shots, and a very disagreeable contusion on his neck from the but-end of a horseman's carbine. He was once taken prisoner by one Frederic, a captain of cavalry in the Rhingrave's regiment, whom the

* This clashes not with the king's account to Charles I, who considered him only in the light of a prisoner. † Baron of Gindersdorf and Weyersberg. This brave man was a German born, but left the Imperial service upon some disgust. Lan-

Suedorum nonnullus ex primariis occubuit: cæterisque insignior Maximilianus cognomento DIABOLUS, mediæ agminis (quod monui) ductor, regi ob fortitudinem charissimus. 1631. army, on account of his stature, surnamed Langfritz* ; who knowing him, made him an offer of quarter, and upon Tilly's refusal gave him the blow just above mentioned ; but Rodolphus duke of Sax-Lauenberg flew to his assistance with two or three horsemen, and bravely rescued him, killing Langfritz with a pistol-shot, adjusting in so great a confusion his aim so true, that the bullet entered one ear, and passed through the other. Pappenheim received six or seven wounds, according to custom ; and the count de Furstenberg was wounded, but not mortally. Cronenberg carried off the general at the head of the unconquerable Walloons, who were reduced now to 600 men, and lodged him by break of day at twenty-one miles distance in the town of Halle. Furstenberg attended Tilly in another coach, and the duke of Sax-Lauenberg assisted Cronenberg in conducting the party. The regiment of Schoenberg soon followed them, but the major part of the broken troops pointed their course towards Halberstadt.

In this confusion sixteen troops of horse formed themselves between the field of battle and the town of Leipzig, but they had no officers to command them ; and neither the generalissimo, nor maréchal de camp, nor serjeant-major della battaglia were to be found. At length Pappenheim appeared amongst them, and having mounted a fresh horse, led them on to make one final effort, but that attempt not succeeding, he carried them off under favour of the night, pursuing that road, which we have just mentioned. All supposed the general to be dead, nor did Pappenheim appear much afflicted at that report ; for Tilly and he had never agreed since he dissuaded the former to desist from his enterprize on the king's camp at Werben †.

The king, according to some ‡, slept all the night succeeding the battle, near a little fire made of fragments of wood, which his soldiers had collected together ; having first dispatched a body of troops to pursue the fugitives. Others tell us, that he invited the elector of Saxony to take part of a cold repast with him in his tent ; and all people, who knew his majesty's warmth of temper, expected he would throw out an oblique sarcasm or two on the misbehaviour of the Saxon troops; but, on the contrary, he told the elector, That his men, considering they were chiefly new raised recruits, behaved extremely well: and then asked him, how he liked his conduct in the transaction of that day; protesting at the same time, he would follow his point vigorously, and pursue the old corporal to the utmost limits of the world. Next morning, after public prayers, and a solemn act of thanksgiving at the head of his army, he mounted on horseback, and returned thanks to his men regiment by regiment: and notwithstanding the Imperial army suffered at that time a sort of general wreck, and every moment was precious to a conqueror, in order to complete his victory more and more upon easier terms, yet this wise and religious prince could not allow himself to pursue the stroke at the very instant his arm was lifted up, till he had first returned his acknowledgment to the Supreme Being, and discharged the debt of gratitude, which he owed to his faithful soldiers; bestowing particular encomiums on the Swedish and Finland horse conducted by Horn, as also on that brave body of Scottish infantry, which Hepburn commanded.

Thus ended one of the greatest battles, that Europe had then seen. It lasted indeed only four hours and an half, without comprehending the two hours, that were employed in cannonading. It was in this respect that Tilly prided himself particularly: and, what was still more, some of his artillery appeared to be of the heaviest sort then in use, and all his batteries were ready fixed; but after the first carriage was once passed over, the king's portable cannons performed wonders*, as Tilly himself acknowledges in his letter. It is true, he says nothing of his majesty's peculiar method of fighting that day in columns (of which the king had made an experiment before in an engagement with the duke de Savelli) nor of some evolutions, which were then esteemed extraordinary †. But this silence is not to be wondered at, since it was varying the attack, and rallying; as also in deep and miry countries with small armies, and upon sudden expeditions.

1631. impossible for Tilly to have commended Gustavus in these present circumstances, without depreciating his own merit. The ground, (if we except the rivulet and the morafs of Scholka, the elevation of the Imperial batteries, and the advantage of the wood where the troops rallied) may be considered as tolerably equal; nor were any entrenchments made use of on either side, there being indeed no time to prepare them. Many regiments charged ten or fifteen times apiece, and some were employed (with only momentary intermissions) from the beginning of the battle to the end: and, what is worth remarking, no officer or foldier in the Swedish or Imperial armies was ever afterwards called to an account for misbehaviour. It may likewise be observed incidentally, that the Swedish cavalry never discharged a pistol till they had received their adversaries fire, and almost touched the heads of their horses: which effect was the more fatal, as the peletons of intermixt musqueteers disunited and broke the enemy's line by meer weight of ball, before they could come to touch their opponents. And what alike deserves our notice, is, that neither the king nor his troops discovered the least dismay upon the flight of the Saxons (and it was perhaps upon this presentiment, that he drew up his forces in two separate armies) though Horn's left wing was thereby laid open and naked, and though the number of the electoral forces was half equal (to say the least of them) to that of the Swedes.

The loss of this battle struck dumb the whole catholic league, after an uninterrupted series of victories for thirteen successive years; and caused so great an astonishment even in the court of Vienna, that the emperor not thinking himself secure in his capital, removed his household to Gratz, the metropolis of Stiria.

The king having employed himself the morning after the battle according to the manner we have related, distributed the 3000 Imperial prisoners amongst his troops; in all which corps were only three subjects of his Britannic majesty, though considerable numbers, Irish especially, then served in the emperor's armies. This being finished, he permitted his soldiers, who had slept all night on the bare ground, and had eaten nothing worth mentioning for two days, to take possession sion of the catholic camp near Leipzig, where they found abundant provisions of every kind. He then at the head of a part of his cavalry invested Leipzig, but leaving the siege to the elector of Saxony, (who by this time was returned from Eülenberg, to which place he and his army had fled on the afternoon of the battle) he pushed on the next morning as far as Merzburg *, whose governor, the baron de Palant, received orders from Tilly to withdraw his garrison; but Pappenheim, who at that period was in effect general over the generalissimo, passing through Merzburg after Tilly, left counter-orders with the baron, which that commander thinking fit to comply with, made a resistance more becoming a man of honour than a man of prudence; for not only he and his garrison, but several broken companies, which had straggled thither after the battle of Leipzig, were all made prisoners of war. 1631.

The king, out of pure politeness, left the reconquering of Leipzig to its lawful possessor, inasmuch as it was very certain, that town must submit of course; and in effect Wrangle the Imperial commander surrendered after a deliberation of two days, and saved 3000 good troops, upon condition, that thenceforwards they were never to bear arms against the crown of Sweden: nevertheless, such commanders and soldiers were excepted, as belonged not bona fide to the garrison. So that about one hundred persons, chiefly officers, were detained as prisoners; and many brave Swedes were released, who had been confined there ever since the storming of Magdeburg; and by this time the king, as Monro, who was there present, assures us, had encreased his army, since the battle of Leipzig, with an addition of 7000 Imperial forces, including prisoners.

Mean while his majesty, at the head of 15,000 men, attended by an army of 10,000 more, advanced as far as Halle, and rendered himself master of the town and castle with no great difficulty. Here he refreshed his men for some days, and returned public thanks to God in the great cathedral, employing every leisure moment in planning

1631. and adjusting his future operations. Before he left this town, many protestant princes, with the elector of Saxony at their head, made him a visit; and here it was, that measures were taken for the completion of the great work, which was to ensue. What is yet more, this mighty plan was all reduced to form in one evening, though that evening was dedicated to festivity; for the elector of Saxony loved the pleasures of the table above measure. Some minutes before supper, colonel Monro entered the room out of curiosity, and the king, who disliked drinking, took him by the shoulder, and said with a whisper, I wish, Monro, you could be master of the bottles and glasses to night, in the absence of old major-general Sir Patrick Ruthven: but you want a strength of head to relieve me on such an occasion, and make your way through an undertaking of so extraordinary a nature. Then turning round to the elector, (upon supposition of resuming his topic) he digressed into a long encomium of the Scottish nation; and beckoning to colonel Hepburn, who stood in another part of the room, recapitulated the purport of his discourse, and recommended him, Lumsdel, and Monro, to the elector's more immediate notice.

At length it was agreed on all hands, that as to pursue Tilly was meer loss of time, it was therefore more expedient, since the emperor and the catholic league could not produce a fresh army very soon, to fall upon the respective dominions of certain popish princes, while their minds were strongly impressed with dismay and terror. But before this great work could be undertaken, it was concluded necessary to employ part of the troops in securing the princes of the house of Anhalt, as likewise the two dioceses of Magdeburg and Halberstadt; and then Gustavus determined to march in person at the head of the residue of his army, even into Bavaria, if that were possible, with an intent to give laws collaterally to the ecclesiastical electors, and the bishops of Wurtzburg and Bamberg: and in the mean while it was allotted the elector of Saxony to carry on the war in Lusatia, Silesia, and Bohemia. What induced Gustavus, who was then ascending to the zenith of his power, and absolute in his decisions in the assembly at Halle, to assign this department (and in effect the high road, which led to Vienna) to the elector of Saxony, hath been a point beyond the power of most historians to explain fully; and many persons have been the more perplexed in their considerations of it, inasmuch as the great Oxenstiern pronounced it to be a false measure *. Nevertheless, we shall speak more amply concerning this difficulty hereafter, not in the least to his Swedish majesty's dishonour, but, on the contrary, very abundantly to his glory. 1631.

We will now for a moment cast our eyes upon the unfortunate Tilly, who reaching Halle in the best manner he could before break of day, sent for the town-surgeon to dress his wounds, and make an incision into his contusion, which gave him at that time inexpressible torments. Upon examining the bruised flesh, the sagacious operator pronounced the general's body to be gefrorn, that is in other words to have been rendered impenetrable by magical incantations, and talismanical signatures † ‡.

From Halle the Imperial commander fled to Halberstadt in a litter, and there having just sufficient strength to bear being placed on an horse for a single hour, made a review of his shattered troops, which amounted to 5000 cavalry, (if we conclude ten cornecies of horse just arrived from Cologne) and some broken bodies of infantry; for the greater part of the army, concluding it more salutary to adhere to Pappenheim, pursued another route under that officer's protection.

The little handful of men re-assembled at Halle expressed great joy to behold their aged general once more; who, when he arrived at Ascherleben, dispatched the Cologne-regiment to join Pappenheim at Mansfelt, and support his retreat. When Pappenheim received this reinforcement, it is asserted by some ||, that he discovered very visible signs of distaste upon being so certainly assured, that the generalissimo was living. Be that as it may, Tilly in two days expedited four expresses to Aldringer, and besought him to join him at his general rendezvous in the duchy of Brunswic, which distressed unfortunate country he considered improperly enough as an asylum; for the emperor had bestowed upon 1631. him, by way of gratification, a considerable part of the territories of the brave duke Christian, who was also bishop of Halberstadt. From Afcherleben he shaped his course through the diocese of Hildesheim, and arrived in ten days after the battle at Alvede, a little town on the river Leyne, which afterwards passes through Hanover. This journey may be considered more as a flight than a march, for in that time he had led his troops 140 miles.

The king of Poland had long lain wait for the event of a decisive battle, hoping, if Tilly had proved once successful, to have recovered all that the Swedes possessed in Prussia: but matters taking a contrary turn, he thought proper to offer up his incense to the conquering party. His Danish majesty made public rejoicing at Copenhagen; yet so deeply rooted was his jealousy of Gustavus, that he privately wished well to the house of Austria. Gustavus knew both these kings to the very bottom, and chose to build upon their fears much rather than upon their adulation. On the other hand, the dukes of Brunswic and Lunenberg were more distinct; and the prince of Anhalt, with all his family, made no ceremony of espousing the cause of Sweden by public treaty; wherein it was declared by him, That reposing himself upon the protection of Gustavus, his intention was to contribute his contingency towards the expences of the war, allowing the Swedes to erect fortifications wherever the king pleased, and construct a bridge over the Elb; towards the completion of which latter work he agreed to furnish both men and money*. Gustavus, moderate in prosperity, as well as undismayed in adversity, received all these princes with thankfulness, and caressed them all: and though the elector of Saxony, after the battle, expected, as we observed before, but cold reception from a prince of so much valour, severity, and frankness, yet our hero commended him for the infinite pains he took to rally his men, and for the sensible regret he manifested upon account of their misbehaviour. The elector charmed with a treatment so unexpected vowed to follow the fortunes of Gustavus to his last moments, and offered the whole of his assistance to procure him to be elected king of the Romans. But the Saxon generals and ministers, who were most of them pensioners to the court of Vienna, soon induced their master to change his ideas : nevertheless, as to all outward appearance the two princes lived together in good intelligence ; manente in speciem concordia.

By this time, as a sort of natural consequence from the victory of Leipzig, Gustavus began to discover, that civil affairs encreased upon his hands, as well as the military ; and for these reasons ordered Oxenstiern, who had been absent from him ever since his arrival in Germany, to relinquish his warlike command in Prussia, and take upon him the office of director general in the new-conquered countries ; or, as others say, legatus ab exercitu. The chancellor set out immediately upon this charge, which seemed more congenial to the bent of his inclinations, and the natural cast of his abilities ; yet reached not Halle till the king had crossed Thuringia, and conquered great part of Franconia.

Mean while it was discussed, in the evening of the entertainment we have lately mentioned, by what methods, and through what inroads the Swedish and Saxon troops should invade the empire, and the allies of the Imperial family ; proper departments being already assigned to the elector of Brandenburg, the landgrave of Hesse, and the dukes of Mechlenberg. On both hands it was compendiously agreed, that to pursue Tilly into Lower-Saxony would remove the seat of war too far from Vienna and Munich, and revive a new scene of distress and misery among the protestant princes of that circle. This scheme therefore being considered as injudicious and chimerical, only two roads presented themselves, whereby it was possible to invade or annoy the house of Austria and the catholic league ; namely, the left hand passage by way of Bohemia, strait to Vienna, which appeared at first sight most practicable, as the road (excepting such defiles and mountains as you find on the northern and southern frontiers) was plain and wide, the country itself abounding in good provisions of all sorts ; and as the Imperials had prepared no troops in those parts by way of opposition ;—and the right hand entrance into Thuringia, which might lead at length as far as Munich, but where many digressive conquests were to be made, and princes of various complexions to be cajoled or threatened ; where the

1631. inhospitable forest, called the Düringer-Wald, was to be crossed, and lastly, where the roads were narrow, serpentine, and miry, and intersected, especially near Bavaria, by rivers and morasses, too numerous to be here recounted.

The elector of Saxony not daring, or not chusing to annoy the house of Austria more than was needful, frankly made the king an offer of resigning to him the Bohemian passage into Austria, which Gustavus rejected in a firm and plenary manner, without assigning any reasons. It is thought by many, that he entertained no high opinion of Arnheim's honesty, and placed as little confidence in the elector's abilities or sincerity. Nor was he satisfied, in case these difficulties could have been removed, that the field-marshal or his master were capable of reducing to obedience even the single circle of Franconia, inasmuch as Tilly, when he had once conjoined his troops with those of Aldringer, Fugger, and the Lorainers, might return upon them (as nearest to him) with great fury, and give them, in all probability, a total overthrow. For he saw too plainly in the day's service at Leipzig, that the Saxon generals and Saxon soldiers, however well intentioned, could perform but little in opposition to the rough and well-seasoned veterans of the Imperial army. For these reasons he thought it prudent to engage their honesty no farther than his own eye could superintend it, nor embark them so deeply, as to run the risque of sacrificing the whole upon any miscarriage on their part; concluding it more advisable just to keep them in breath by maintaining a diversion; and enure them to an apprenticeship in war, before they fate up for principals and masters in such a difficult profession.—Having therefore well arranged and adjusted all these ideas in his own mind, he pronounced only the result of his private reasonings to the assembly, declaring in a few words, That as the princes and orders of Silesia had considered the elector of Saxony as the first protector of the protestant cause ever since the breaking out of the Bohemian troubles, it was highly incumbent on the said elector to fix his footing in Silesia, and then extend his conquest into Bohemia.—That for his own part, with the concurrence of his electoral highness, he had resolved once for all to penetrate through Thuringia into Franconia, having having already prepared all things necessary for such an expedition; being determined not only to allow a breathing-space to the princes and states of Upper-Germany, but to make the enemy a visit in his own lodgings, and give Tilly a second chance, if he thought proper to confront him in the field of battle *. Thus spoke the king, and as no man replied; both the debate and the conversation ended, though the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, the dukes of Mecklenberg, and the princes of the house of Anhalt and Weymar were all present at this august assembly.

About this time Christian Margrave of Culmbach entered into a confederation with his majesty upon the self same footing as that, which had been concluded with the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, to which the administrator of Wirtemberg afterwards acceded; which gave the Swedes great credit in the circle of Suabia. The bishop of Bamberg || made pretence too of copying the examples above mentioned, and saved himself for the present by a mean act of equivocal interpretation: but the Swedes remembered him at a more convenient season, so that upon the whole he lost the reputation of a man of honour, and gained nothing but the character of a dissembler, who attempted fruitlessly to over-reach a prince of superior talents.

The king then dispatched Chemnitz †, and another deputy, named Relinghen, to the Margrave of Brandenburg's ‡ place of residence: and from Bareüth instructed them to pass forwards, and sound the intentions of the Nurenbergers, and other protestants, with orders to use both kind words and menacing innuendoes. Chemnitz acquitted himself very plausibly in the embassies, but the Nurenbergers at first had not courage to make any declarations against the house of Austria: for indeed they had but just transmitted a paper of allegiance to Aldringer, sealed and signed in due form by the whole body of their patricians. Poppy too, an Imperial deputy, who then resided at Amberg, constantly reminded them of this solemn engagement: so that the most they offered was a sort of neutrality, upon which the king wrote them a letter with his own hand, therein observing, That he saw through the 1631. surfaces of their hearts the Imperial interests in full proportion and distinctness at bottom ; and that the middle course, which they proposed to steer, was calculated upon no other principle, than to amuse and deceive him. For my own part, continued he, I look upon all neutralities with an eye of contempt, and shall treat neutral protestants upon the footing of enemies, wherever I find them. This letter being read in the public senate-house, where upwards of 200 Patricians were then assembled, either terrified them into reason, or served as a pretext to justify them for relinquishing the interests of the house of Austria. Upon this the whole magistracy inclined unanimously to the cause of Sweden, and signed afterwards a treaty of alliance in conjunction with the other orders and states of the circle of Franconia. Chemnitz then received fresh instructions to continue at Nurenberg, and the other deputy passed on to Ulm, and from thence to Guntzburg, in which journey, being by profession a captain of horse, he fell with his little escort on an Imperial commissary, guarded by a body of twenty musqueteers, and having killed that officer with a pistol-ball, carried along with him on to Strasburg the strong box, which contained upwards of a thousand pounds, and consecrated the whole sum to his master's service.

Mean while the king, conformably to his late plan (it being now only ten days after the battle of Leipzig) advanced at the head of his army to render himself master of Erfurt, a large city in the famous forest of Thuringia, dependant by dubious and disputable tenure on the elector of Mentz*, which prelate was the first prince of the catholic league, against whom Gustavus thought proper to commence hostilities. Nevertheless, before it was possible for him to demand admission, a body of delegated magistrates respectfully told him, that he was extremely welcome to make his residence among them in person, but begged to be excused from admitting a garrison. His answer was, That he came as a friend, and not as an enemy : and for their advantage preferably to his own ; that it was never his custom to make strangers his guards, and place himself in such a situation as to be obliged to receive laws from other men ; Alterius non sit, qui suus esse potest. These were the very words he made use of on the occasion; and upon the departure of these venerable senators, ordered duke William of Sax-Weymar, under pretence of escorting them with an honorary body of horse, to squeeze into the city at the same time, that they entered. He then told the inhabitants in a long speech, that may be considered not only as a public justification of himself for entering Germany, but as a pattern of christian magnanimity, and religious moderation, “That the public might be curious to be informed of what nature and cogency those motives were, which induced him first to interpose in the Germanic system.” I embark, said he, in a war far from my native dominions, and seem to court those dangers and difficulties, which another man might labour to decline: but the searcher of the human heart well sees and knows, that it was neither ambition, that tempted me, nor the avarice of extending my dominions, nor the appetite of fighting, nor the mischievous petulance of interfering. Other object I had none, than to support the afflicted and oppressed, to maintain the religious and civil rights of society, and bear my testimony against a tyranny over the whole human nature. The Supreme Being hitherto hath conferred upon me the marks of a providential concurrence, and has rendered me the willing, but unworthy instrument of restoring liberty both corporal and mental to the late unhappy inhabitants in the various provinces of Lower-Germany. But, my friends, let us always remember, that in this general storm and wreck of mankind, no one interested person must propose to glean any ruins to himself, nor sit abjectly lamenting with his arms folded, when the helm requires one man, when the anchor asks a second, and the sails demand a third. It is well known, I solicited for peace before my army entered Germany: I asked for it a second time very near the period of the inhuman massacre at Magdeburg; and am open to receive it now, even fourteen days after the decisive victory of Leipsic.—But the instinct of God prompts me still to continue amongst you, and the necessity of things (in the first chain of which I had no concern) compels me to protect and make conditions for my allies, my kinsmen, and brethren in religion: nor will I ever desert them, till God resumes that existence, which at present he has thought fit to make my portion.—I acknowledge, with gratitude to the Supreme Being, that my mind is yet firm; and my body robust; I thank him likewise for 1631. having blessed me with no vulgar success, and for enduing me with abilities capable of applying that success to suitable purposes: nevertheless I am neither vain-glorious in my past prosperities, nor inapprehensive of the future frowns of providence. It is certain too, that I contend with an army of veteran troops, rendered masters of their profession by experience, and sharpened afresh by disappointment and despair: and besides all this, it is a point incontestable, that war, in the very best hands, is a game of uncertainty.——If I oppress any man, merely through the urgency of circumstances, it is I that feel, as well as he:—if I request you to receive a garrison, and expend some money in new-fortifying your city, it is because I would verify that protection, which I sincerely promise you. It had never been my custom first to conquer, and then enslave; and of this the town of Riga is an instance undeniable. You too may repose on the sincerity of my protection, when I assure you, that I intend to leave among you, as a pledge or depositum, the invaluable object of all my affections in this world, and that is the queen of Sweden †.*

His majesty, when the town-deputies met him between Halle and Erfurt, had graciously given them his word of honour to protect the liberties of the people, and not interrupt the established religion, with which the magistrates appeared highly contented. Nevertheless, being extremely delicate with regard to all imputations of subterfuge and retractation, he reduced his engagements under nine distinct articles into writing ‡, which being duly signed and sealed, gave such redoubled satisfaction to the principal inhabitants of the town and district, that they presented on their side a counterpart-protestation, wherein (after having first obliged themselves by oath to continue faithful and obedient to him, his heirs, his crown and allies during the whole period of this religious war) they engaged to defend their town bona fide against all hostile attacks; to attempt nothing to the detriment of his majesty's arms, but, on the contrary, make discovery of all things, that tended to his prejudice; concluding with this general protestation, that they enrolled themselves under the king's protection with submission and gratitude,

The king, who always made the tour of every city the first leisure moment after he had conquered it, (for he loved to see the populace, and found it his interest likewise to be seen by them) directed his steps, as some think by design, into the church of St. Peter, and meeting the abbot at his first entrance, requested him to advise his sovereign to withdraw his troops from the army of the league, and not strengthen the enemies of the protestants: that for his own part he bore no ill will to the electoral body, and should be greatly mortified, if obliged to use them contrary to his intentions: that the emperor only, was his man and his object: and as the Imperial soldiers had robbed him of a beaver-hat † in Pomerania, he was come thus far to re-demand it ‡.

When the jesuits threw themselves at his feet, he raised them from the ground, and said, They had much to answer for before God's tribunal, on account of the commotions they had raised, and the blood they had occasioned to be spilt throughout the world. That for his own part he was so far a jesuit; as to be able to comprehend, that their projects were ill intentioned, their proceedings oblique, and their maxims dangerous. That it would become them more to peruse their breviaries, and handle their rosaries (in imitation of the decorum and moderation of other good catholic ecclesiastics,) than to embroil themselves in the intrigues of state, and make the world a sea of blood: exhorting them to continue in repose, and advertise their brethren of this discourse, since if they remained inactive, and in profound submission, strict care should be taken, that no person should molest them ||.

Things being thus adjusted and explained, he gave the papists assurances, that they had the free liberty to continue undisturbed in the exercises of their religion, or sell their estates and effects, and retire into what country they pleased: but as to such, as had deserted their places of abode without waiting for an explanation, he should make no scruple to confiscate their goods in order to fit up the mansion destined for the reception of his royal consort. 1631. clergy, as likewise school-masters and professors in the university, he placed them with singular honour under his own immediate protection, and exempted them from the disagreeableness of quartering soldiers, or contributing in any shape towards the expences of the war. With respect to the catholic ecclesiastics, he contented himself with their declaring solemnly, that they would no ways prejudice the Swedish crown, nor the allies of Sweden. He then in the last place, having made a treaty with the dukes of Sax-Weymar, appointed William, the elder brother, a prince extremely popular, and who had many connexions in those parts, to be governor of the city and district of Erfurt (which contains about seventy-three parishes) and the whole province of Thuringia : nominating the count of Lowenstein to be commander of the garrison *, and referring all civil matters to Sternberg, who acted in the double capacity of judge and public minister. In like manner, some days before, he created Lewis, prince of Anhalt, stadtholder of Halle, and director of the duchy of Magdeburg, joining with him Stalman as chancellor, and colonel Sneydwin † as military commander in the city, and precisely for the same reasons ; cautiously avoiding to put native Swedes into such employment for fear of giving umbrage to the Germans.

His majesty now ‡ turned all his thoughts towards the reduction of Franconia, a circle of more importance to the Imperialists than any other, as it afforded them means of resisting and retarding their aggressors, partly from the abundance of narrow defilés and difficult passes, and partly from the rocky and unequal nature of the ground in various places : yet though one half of the country be wild, woody, and scantily peopled, which renders the march of an enemy highly disagreeable, yet the other half, at the same time, vies with any tract or territory in the empire, both for populousness of inhabitants, and for a plentiful supply of corn and forage, which might have enabled the defendants to have protracted their resistance, or made a vigorous opposition in such very manner as pleased them best. But Tilly had over-shot these objects, in marching so precipitately to the north-west, which may be considered as a signal oversight; for on his returning to relieve Wurtzburg, he found Gustavus had adjusted his game in such a manner, that he had reserved to himself the grand privileges of starving the Imperialists, and declining an engagement.

The king, partly to extend his conquests, and partly to subsist his army (which consisted of 20,000 effective men) through the fatigues of a long and painful march, where provisions were to be obtained with difficulty, and the circumstance of transporting his artillery was very perplexing, judged extremely well to divide his forces into two bodies, in order to cross, with greater conveniency, the vast forest of Thuringia, so unfurnished of villages and market-towns. The column, which took the right-hand road, was committed to the care of Bauditzen, as commander in chief; and colonel Hepburn. Bauditzen made himself master of Smalcalden, Meinungen, Newstadt, Hamelburg, Gemund, and Carlstadt, as he passed along. This general was as cool in reflection, and as brave in execution, as any officer, that served under the king; but to these uncommon shining qualities was superadded the tarnishing character of a low and dirty rapaciousness *. Hence it was, that in order to squeeze contributions from the inhabitants of the principal cities, through which his rout lay, he consented to quarter his soldiers in little corps and open fields; and thus in a march of only eight days duration †, contrived to put five thousand pounds into his pocket without the privity of his royal master; nor did he impart a single dollar

* He married Mademoiselle Rantzau, a lady born in Holstein, who (though a co-heiress with three other sisters) brought him an extraordinary fortune for that age and country; namely, 16000 l. sterling.

† There is something surprizingly rapid in Gustavus's motions, even in bad roads, and at a time when he was encumbered with very heavy artillery; for from a diary of this march it appears, that Bauditzen crossed the forest (twenty-seven miles) in two days: lay the third night at

Meinungen (thirteen miles and an half;) the fourth at Millerstadt (thirteen miles and a half;) the fifth at Newstadt (thirteen miles and an half;) the sixth at Gemund, (thirteen miles;) the seventh at Carlstadt (nine miles;) and the eighth at Wurtzburg (nine miles.) So that in this expedition he marched one hundred and eleven miles: and an half in eight days, and received the capitulations of six considerable towns as he passed along. But the king reached Wurtzburg, and took it before his lieutenant general arrived.

1631. to the brave Hepburn, and such other officers as acted under him. When the king heard the story, he thought proper to remove him to a more remote command in Pomerania, partly from a detestation of such practices, and partly because the troops protested they did not care to serve under such a general; though probably one half of that objection resulted from his having made no participants in his extortion. Be this as it will, thus much is certain, that the land-officers in that age dealt a little too largely in prize-money; which hung like a dead weight on his majesty's spirits, who foresaw wisely (upon supposition troops were warmly clothed, well fed, and punctually paid) that such kind of practices must in time subvert all discipline, all principle, and all military enthusiasm: for nothing renders soldiers so cruel, and so pusillanimous, as the love of money;

And therefore, as we shall observe more particularly on another occasion, it was a sort of maxim with Gustavus, which he always threw out to his officers, as they stood round him; That the science of war was an humane and liberal profession; and that he ever drew a line of partition between the man of service and the ruffian; the hero and the Croatian. Nor did the king in this exception lay any restraint on the freedom of his own conduct; for he, Pappenheim, Horn, Gassion, &c. were all men of very exact and regular lives, and so was Tilly; if we except his bigotry and cruelty at the siege of Magdeburg. They performed far greater exploits in the field, than “those extraordinary heroes, whose immoralities (says an ingenious author *,) “make almost as much noise as “their victories.”

But to return to the route, which his majesty pursued: the morning he left Erfurt, he sent a message to the count of Schwartzenberg †, that

tled in England with the Saxons. And this branch enjoyed considerable possessions in Berkshire and elsewhere in the beginning of the last century. he purposed to take a bed in his castle of Gunter, near Arnstadt, the ensuing evening. The nobleman was very uneasy at this unexpected frankness, because one of his ancestors had done the Swedes great mischief in a former war. He was weak enough to make his apologies on that head: but Gustavus told him smilingly and composedly, That he had nothing to fear, inasmuch as his predecessor had acted like a man of honour and fidelity; and that he only desired such a brave and affectionate set of officers under himself. During this visit, a party, detached from the main army, took Gotha by surprize; and the king dispatched letters of accommodation to the two principal personages of the catholic league in Franconia; namely, the bishops of Wurtzburg * and Bamberg. He then, having refreshed his men a little at Ilmenau, traversed that dreary and inhospitable tract called the Durringer-Walt; and as the troops broke up their quarters early, and reached them late, the route proposed to be pursued was illuminated mornings and nights with matches affixed to trees, and lanterns erected on stationary posts at befitting distances. The difficulties of transporting the artillery through this forest (which occurred to me at the time I crossed it) were sufficient to have dismayed any general less enterprizing than Gustavus. Nevertheless, he surmounted the rocks and hills, steered his course dextrously along the precipices, and glided between the thick woods in so adroit and serpentine a manner, that he reached the south-west boundaries of this wild or walt on the third evening; having presented himself, as he passed along, before the strong castle of Masfelt (which being since dismantled, lies now in an heap of ruins,) whilst an advanced party of his light-horse had the good fortune to seize Dacosta, governor of the fortress, and commissary over the district round it, who at that time, like a vigilant warrior, was amusing himself in coursing a hare. In consequence of this unparalleled carelessness on the part of the commander, this important strong-hold surrendered to the conqueror upon easy terms. His majesty pursued his journey next morning to Koëninghofen; not the Koëninghofen, which stands on the Tauber, (for there are two towns of the name in the circle of Franconia) but that, which appertaineth to

As the numerous garrisons in the town and castle seemed to make preparations for no vulgar resistance, the king thundred upon them by break of day from such batteries, as he could erect the preceding night; for he wanted this town exceedingly (it being victualled for a twelve-month's resistance, no uncomfortable allurements to an hungry army :) yet during this momentary siege, whilst his mind was kept upon the stretch of impatience, he gave the public a very particular example of humanity; for having battered down one of the principal towers, he sent word to the garrison, That his intention was to lay the whole city in ashes; but if they would send out the women and children, he would give them a courteous and hospitable reception *.

Struck with such marks of benignity, joined to a valour and firmness, which they had thoroughly experienced, the besieged capitulated immediately, with very slight degrees of ceremony; though few places of the same size with Koëninghofen (it being the magazine and arsenal of the diocese of Wurtzburg, as well as the principal fortrefs) could be supposed to be better furnished with ammunition, provisions, arms, and artillery: and in this supposed asylum was deposited great part of the wealth and rich moveables, that belonged to the nobility and gentry, who lived in the district, which lay round it. One good regiment was left in the town by way of garrison, and Ernest, another prince of the house of Sax-Weymar, and brother to William and Bernard, was appointed governor. It was during this siege, that the king gave an extraordinary proof not only of his intrepidity, but that he imagined no soldiers, even those belonging to the enemy, could be guilty of a cowardly and illiberal action. For riding up within half a musquet shot of the town-gate, after he had sent a trumpeter to summon the garrison to capitulate, he observed the guards blowing their matches to give fire against his person; Sacrament †! cried he, (the only time we ever observed him to swear)

find it, yet it's doubtful to me, whether the king made use of the sort of oath (not uncommon in German mouths) which is here mentioned: for swear) if you discharge one piece, the king shall know it: and he hath made a vow, that in case such an accident should happen, that not a single soul shall receive quarter; but if you treat fairly, your own conditions shall then be granted you*.

Next morning (for the siege and capitulation lasted only one day) his majesty, willing to improve on the enemy's consternation, and verify what was said of him (partly out of pure despite to Tilly) by the partizans of Walstein; namely, that he conquered the first circle of the empire, before the expresses could carry the news of his irruption to the court of Vienna; pursued his road to Sweinfurt with all imaginable alacrity; for he marched his army twenty-six miles in one day, at the distance of three weeks from the autumnal equinox, and that, maugre the hard service of the day preceding; and the march the day anterior to that, from Schleüßing to Koënihshofen, which may be computed at twenty miles and one half.

In the space of a single hour, his majesty invested Sweinfurt, and admitted the governor into a capitulation, allowing the garrison to retire to Wurtzburg, and appointing Charles Harte to be commander of the town, at the head of a regiment well approved and thoroughly experienced. In the middle of the day's march to this place, an old Imperial captain with one eye, assisted by such resolute peasants as he could assemble together, took possession of a wooden house, that projected into the street of a little village or dorp, called Lauringen, (through which place lay a narrow and difficult pass) and stopped the whole van-guard of the Swedish cavalry for a very considerable time, till at length the dragoons found themselves obliged to dismount, and cut this diminutive garrison to pieces. When the king refreshed himself at Lauringen some hours afterwards, and learnt what retardment

it was remarked of him [Merc. Franc. Tom. XVI.] that far from digressing into any rash oath in the ordinary course of conversation, he was rarely or never known to be betrayed into a single expression of that kind, even under the influence of passion, or when any extraordinary event surprized him: and as a proof of this (since it is hardly probable he would have counterworked his own example) it was a fixed point of discipline with him, that whenever any soldier had been proved guilty either of cursing or swearing, he was condemned to stand for a considerable season, with his hands tied up against a pike in such manner, as if he implored the divine forgiveness.

had been occasioned to his progress by the inflexible obstinacy of a single man, he vowed (designedly, as it's thought, in order to acquire the knowledge of some secrets) to put the one eyed officer to death, for sacrificing the poor peasants, and making a resistance, which favoured more of the madman than the soldier. In the transports therefore of this resentment, he sent for the provost-marshal and the executioner; but neither one nor the other could be found*. Nevertheless, during the time, that was employed in these researches, the captain contrived to make his peace with his majesty, by informing him of the strength of Wurtzburg, and the approaches, that led to the fortifications: and thus the affair ended, not without reciprocal satisfaction on either side.

The amazing rapidity of the king's conquests, dissolved immediately the catholic part of the assembly then convened at Francfort upon the Mayne, it being agreed both by papists and protestants, that the sword might cut the difficulties of the edict of restitution, much sooner than the nice hands of the Jus-publicists could pretend to unravel them. The first person, that fled, was the grand-master of the Teutonic order †, who sat as president in this assembly, conscious of an irreligious and imprudent speech he had once made, namely, that the holy empire would never see a peaceable moment, till every protestant was massacred, who had arrived to the seventh year of his age. On this account he had no desire to pay his compliments to a man of spirit like Gustavus. Nor did the bishop of Wurtzburg, who had distinguished himself by an uncommon zeal for the cause of the league, chuse to receive a

* Chemnit. Tom. i. pag. i. This very circumstance serves to confirm us, that the king's anger was only a passion assumed and personated; for there were four provosts and an executioner at that time belonging to every regiment, that acted under him. Nor is it to be supposed, that he, who never committed one act of cruelty in all his campaigns, should have put to death a brave old Walloon, who at that very instant was mortally wounded:—but knowing well, that the man despised simple death as much as himself, he therefore chose to operate upon him by proposing a sort of exit, which carried with it an idea of disgrace; and counterfeited anger for a few moments, in order to palliate and justify a resolution (to the poor man's apprehension) which would otherwise have argued an insensibility in the heart, and an obliquity in the judgment of the Great Gustavus.

Swedish visit in his own metropolis; but dislodging thence just before the letter of summons reached the town, consigned himself, boldly enough, into the army of the house of Austria, and for this reason, in the month of January following, was sent ambassador into France in the name of all the catholic electors. 1631

The bishop of Bamberg, who had parts inferior to this prelate, and less firmness, sheltered himself, as persons of little genius are apt to do, under the low arts of duplicity and evasion: for having agreed by his deputies, (conformably to his own proposals) not only to advance the king three tuns of gold*, and pay the same monthly contingent he paid the army of the league, but to recall his forces from the catholic service, and deliver up the strong fortresses of Torcheim and Cronach; he suddenly, upon the approach of Tilly, renounced all, that he had stipulated; which infamous violation of faith gave the king not only vexation, but a new scene of employment, and obliged him to detach Horne from the main army, in order to carry on a fresh war in the episcopal territories.

Gustavus by this time was greatly pleased to find himself arrived within one day's march of the town of Wurtzburg: nevertheless, he had a previous work still upon his hands, a point of nicety of the highest importance to him, an adopted favourite idea in one branch of his military system; and that was, to secure to himself the free navigation of rivers, and the Mayne especially, at the present conjuncture; for it was a doctrine with him, as war was then circumstanced, (few towns being fortified so as to make more than a fortnight's resistance). "That the general, who commanded the great rivers, commanded more or less the countries adjacent; possessing himself of the most fruitful tracts in corn and herbage, enabled to receive provisions from remote territories, and transport his heavy artillery with no considerable difficulty." I observe, said he, (and the observation at that time was true) *that countries are conquered upon the same principle they were first peopled; the method of war and the method of nature being in these cases the same. * About twenty seven thousand pounds sterling.

1631. dane system: on the banks of rivers stand always the richest and most populous cities; nor can a general be compelled to fight, when one half of his entrenchments is the best natural fossé in the world ready made to his hands; namely, a large and profound body of water *. Upon this principle therefore his majesty, (in conjunction with some other reasons above assigned, not to mention, that he chose to have the Mayne spread between him and Tilly) commanded Bauditzen to pursue a separate route on the banks of the aforementioned river for the space of thirty miles below Wurtzburg, himself directing his course the same number of miles on the banks of the said river above the town, (for the Mayne here forms a sort of an horse-shoe) so that about one and the same time he and his lieutenant-general made themselves masters of Hasfurt, Gemund, Lohr, Volkach, Kitzing, Oxenfurt, Remlingen and Carlstadt, all places of importance, which commanded the navigation of the Mayne. Nor was the taking these precautions unworthy of Gustavus; for Tilly by this time being joined by Aldringer, Fugger, and the troops of Lorraine, advanced full speed at the head of 50,000 men, in order to interrupt the siege of Wurtzburg. Nevertheless, the king, contented with possessing the bridges and passes, and not displeased with placing so deep a current as the Mayne between himself and his enemy, pursued his journey to Wurtzburg without dismay, and having invested the city, and petarded one of its gates before nine in the morning, received a visit from father Ogleby, abbot of the Scotch monastery, and a citizen, whom the magistracy had deputed to sign terms of capitulation with him. Of course an interdiction was issued out against all hostilities, and articles were agreed upon without much ceremony, conformably to the model of those, which had lately been concluded at Erfurt.

The rich and populous city of Wurtzburg lies in a semi-circle, and the river Mayne forms the diameter. The town, in point of strength, was no great object, so that the magistrates sent the keys thereof by Ogleby, after having made a very slight resistance: during which, the Bohemian colonel Schevaliski, an officer of great repute, was struck in the side by an arquebuse à croc, as he entertained Gustavus with some remarks. But the castle called Marienberg was really something; it stands to the westward of the city, and communicates with the town by means of a fair large bridge, consisting of six arches, and wide enough to admit threescore men to march in front. It is mistress of the city beneath it, and is commanded by no adjacent hill. Being deemed inaccessible, all the wealth of the country was heaped up in it. The only approach was on the side of the city, and that was hazardous beyond description. The garrison consisted of a thousand men, abundantly supplied with ammunition and provisions for a siege equal in duration to that of Ostend. His majesty sent captain Keller, the commandant, the general compliment, which happens at the beginning of all sieges; namely, a polite offer of decent terms, in case he thought fit to surrender. The brave German received the Swedish deputies with great civility, and gave them an handsome supper at the best inn in the town: nevertheless, he persisted inflexible against all their proposals, and during the course of the repast blew up one arch of the bridge. Next morning he tormented the assailants above measure by a perpetual discharge of his artillery, which, to render matters more disagreeable, raked the bridge from one end to the other; so that, as the Swedes could only place one plank over the broken arch (and that plank was forty-eight feet above the surface of the water) it seemed to be a mixture of wantonness and rashness to attempt to pass over. Gustavus seemed irresolute for some moments what to do, for Tilly and the duke of Lorraine were in full march against him, at the distance of only three days journey from Wurtzburg: but after a slight pause he cut the dilemma short; as Bauditzen and his army were expected to arrive the next day, by determining to take the castle at all hazards; and to this purpose employed one Ramsay (who talked excellent German) a Scots lieutenant in the regiment of Sir James Ramsay, to pass over the plank in a habit of disguise, and procure a boat or two from the neighbouring peasants and fishermen: for the king saw plainly, that the watry ordeal of passing the plank would be extremely slow and hazardous, and that one company of Keller's men, posted on the opposite side of the bridge, would overturn his single soldiers as fast as they arrived: he foresaw too, that the uncommonly

1631. dangerous and (to hardened veteran troops like his) ridiculous nature of the passage would engage the whole army's attention in a very barbarous and unprofitable sort of pantomime. Be that as it may, the honest North-Briton undertook his commission with great cheerfulness and alacrity; but as he was endued with more courage than foresight, he forgot to change a fine waistcoat, which the Imperialists soon discovered; nor did he regain his liberty till the castle of Marienberg was taken by storm. Nevertheless, other expedients were found out, and a boat at length arrived, in which Gustavus sent over handfuls of men by little and little, who made a lodgment, and encreasing imperceptibly, defended themselves so well, that though Keller descended from his eminence to the foot of the rock, he found it impossible to force them. After a sharp rencounter, the besieged remounted to an half moon about mid-way up the precipice, and in that situation night came on. But before this, when the Swedish soldiers in the town saw their comrades had crossed the water, and began to entrench themselves, they run over the plank like men possessed; so that no inconsiderable body of troops passed the river man by man in one afternoon*. At night care was taken to repair this passage in a better manner; but the king could not spare a moment's leisure for that purpose the preceding day, waiting for the arrival of Bauditzen, and being in some suspense about Tilly.

Having now fixt his footing on the south side of the Mayne, he began to study the fortifications of Marienberg † with great attention, soon perceiving, that nature had done wonders, and art but little, if you except a deep graff or moat hewn out of the living rock, which environed the castle all round, of such a depth and breadth, that there was no crossing it, but in front of the main fortification by means of a narrow draw-bridge. If this fossé, and the works, that protected the draw-bridge had been out of the question, the castle was nothing more than a magnificent Gothic palace, flanked at the angles with four principal towers in the antient taste. Upon one of these towers, the king thundered all that night and two successive days, excepting, not unreasonably, that the fall of this antique structure might fill the ditch with rubbish and ruins. But the event, though the tower was at length levelled, did not answer the idea, which he had formed: so removing the intended attack from that quarter, he fixt his whole attention (the line of circumvallation being now finished) first on the half moon above-mentioned, and then on the castle gate and stone bridge over the ditch. In the first of these attacks, Sir James Ramsay (for the Scots, in conjunction with Axel Lily's regiment, had the honour of the action) had the misfortune to be shot through the left arm; but his camerade, Sir John Hamilton, carried on the assault with unparalleled bravery, and in two hours this important outwork was taken. The king surveyed all the action at a few paces distance, peeping through the ruins of an old gate-way between the bridge and the castle; but projecting his head and part of his body to issue out his orders with more distinctness, a cannon-ball flew directly towards him, and covered him with mortar and rubbish. He then stepped out to give some second directions, and a musquet-bullet struck the top of his buff-leather-glove, and tore it off his hand: but Scheffer assures us, that at this siege, fighting in one attack at the head of his men, he received an ugly wound in the fleshy part of his breast, and that the waistcoat stained with royal blood is still preserved in Sweden*.

Next morning he determined, at the head of his troops †, to make a second general attack sword in hand, at one hour before break of day, allotting this honour to Axel Lily's regiment, and the old blue brigade, supported afterwards by the whole body of Swedish and German infantry, having first sent a trumpeter to Keller with proposals of such a nature, as no ways misbecame a brave commander and a resolute garrison; but the governor had no ears wherewith to listen to an accommodation.—And here it may be worth observing, that chance very often produces wonderful events to the resolute and determined; or, in other

In the midst of the besiegers preparations, and about half an hour before the general attack, a Swedish lieutenant, born of Scottish parents*, with only seven followers †, (for what reasons cannot be guessed) approached in the dark to the draw-bridge, which leads into the outward court of the castle, wherein were lodged near two hundred Imperialists. Being challenged, according to the word of the night, and asked, who he and his party were, he replied abruptly and naturally, without any scheme or foresight, That they were Swedes: from whence one may be induced to imagine, that he had never prepared himself to return an answer to such sort of questions ; being an hero better calculated for blows than dialogue. Upon this the officer, who commanded the party within, attempted immediately to draw up the bridge, but the Lifelander jumped upon it with an extraordinary effort of activity, and his companions followed him: in consequence whereof, the enemy took a sudden panic, which darkness contributed to encrease, and recoiled with some confusion, supposing great numbers to be rushing in. The lieutenant cried aloud to a large body of Swedes, which was stationed at no great distance from him ; and thus the outward court of the castle was secured in an instant. Of course the fortress of Marienberg was now conquered: yet the king, who always had a great abhorrence to rude bloodshed, and tumultuous murder, made fresh signals of accommodation to the garrison ; but Keller continued inflexible to the very last moment. Some hundreds of Imperialists threw away their lives with uncommon obstinacy, till at length the Swedes cried out in a rage, Magdeburg-quarter, Magdeburg-quarter. Amongst the dead, were found at least twenty friars, who had occasionally taken up the pike and the musquet. The commander Keller was taken prisoner sword in Greater part of the wealth of the dioceſe was here concealed, as alſo the ſum, which the elector of Bavaria had ſent to Tilly in order to repair his ſhattered army after the unfortunate defeat at Leiſfic. Corn and proviſions were found in abundance, and a very large quantity of wine †. An equerry belonging to the prelate made freſh discoveries, and amongſt other things, gave indications of a certain coffer, well filled with ducats, which Guſtavus conceived a thought of appropriating to the uſes of his own privy purſe ; but its weight in the removal burſt the bottom ; and as the ſoldiers caſt a longing eye on theſe glittering reliques, and began to pick them up for their maſter's uſe, with a private view to ſecrete here and there a few for themſelves, the king made a merit of neceſſity, and ſaid with a loud laugh, I ſee plainly it muſt be ſo : let the rogues convert them to their own property ‡.

Having allowed his ſoldiers to plunder with moderation for the ſpace of one hour, he reſerved nothing for his own uſe but the fine library of books (which was ſent to the univerſity of Upſal ||, by way of re- priſal upon Tilly, who had transported the Palatin collection to the Vatican,) as alſo the biſhop's magnificent ſervice of plate, and a ſtable of horſes, thought ſuperior to any in the empire : not to mention the artillery, which amounted to thirty large pieces, and all the ſmall arms, 1631. of which latter there was a quantity sufficient to furnish at least 7000 men. It may be worth remarking, that amidst all this scene of bloodshed, confusion, and plunder, not a nun was violated (though the nuns had refuged themselves in this asylum from all parts of the diocese *) not a matron affronted, nor a child terrified; for the royal orders were expressly calculated to the contrary: and what may alike merit our observation, is, that all the valuable effects in the vault, which belonged to the inhabitants of the city, were restored to them promptly and punctually. Free exercise of the Romish religion was granted to all, that made profession of it, and a new chamber of justice was erected, consisting of twelve members, half protestants and half papists, one moiety, gentlemen, and the other, civilians.

Nor must we omit two other circumstances, which took their rise from this siege: the first was, Hamilton was so offended, that the Scottish soldiers had not the honour of conducting the last assault, that he demanded his dismissal from Gustavus, which was immediately allowed him. The second was, that when the king entered the castle, the very instant after it was stormed, he perceived, that the pavement of the court-yard was all covered with prostrated bodies; but when he observed them more narrowly, discovered that some of the men (who did not care to be quite so much in earnest as their commander) looked very florid in the countenance. Upon which, being by this time convinced, that part of the number only counterfeited death, he commanded them, with a cheerful accent of voice, to arise, for their lives were safe. In consequence of which, a part of the hundreds, whom my history killed in the preceding pages, started up from the ground, and returned his majesty their best acknowledgments.

Upon taking Wurtzburg, and several other Roman catholic towns, some of the king's generals persuaded him to lay heavy contributions on the citizens for making profession of an erroneous, extravagant, and persecuting religion. But his answer upon these occasions was always to one effect; It is now my city, and appertaineth no longer to the enemy: I came let free beings live as best pleaseth them, conformably to their antient habitudes :

 I change no religious laws to those, who act consistently with such laws as they have hitherto professed ; — a new, though a better shoe, may pinch too much at first. Adding sometimes, that the papists and protestants, supposing them sincere in their searches after truth, and in its practice, were all God's workmanship. — So that in effect, when he conquered a country, the Romanists lost nothing but their prince, (which some did not greatly regret ;) and the protestants regained the free exercise of their religion.
 Thus one party was transported with joy, and the other felt very little sorrow. — Which humane and prudent deportment of Gustavus recalls to my mind a similar piece of conduct in one of his predecessors, and that no less person than Theodoric, king of the Goths; who shared the Roman empire with Justinian. A strange and remote example, mankind may be apt to say ! and yet not unworthy of being produced on this occasion ; for in one of his rescripts he expresseth himself precisely thus : Aliorum forte regum prælia captarum civitatum prædas appetunt aut ruinas : nobis propositum est, Deo juvante, sic vincere, *ut subjeñi se doleant nostrum dominium tardius acquisisse **.

His Swedish majesty, if we consider how zealously the bishop of Wurtzburg † had appeared against him, sent him terms upon the reduction of Marienberg, which were neither severe nor ungenerous, since it was only proposed, that he should pay the protestant army the same contingent, that he had subscribed to the forces of the league, in the like proportions as he had contributed formerly, and at the same times of payment. In consequence whereof he was likewise to disclaim all connexions with the king's enemies, and redeem his territories from plunder at the expence of something more or less than thirty-six thousand pounds.
 Hatzfield, the then bishop, made a semblance of entering into a fair and candid accommodation ; but it was only a pretext to gain time, till Tilly, who was then only at nine miles distance, could take some opportunity to cross the Mayne, and drive Gustavus out of Franconia.

But before we leave Wurtzburg, it may not be improper to observe, that Sir Henry Vane was admitted to his first audience * with Gustavus in this place, though the German, French, and Italian historians all suppose their first conference to have been held at Francfort. This new negotiator appeared to many but poorly qualified for the embassy he embarked in, inasmuch as he was a perfect islander, and fulfilled to a tittle Barclay's observation upon us in the Euphormio, "Angli sua suosque impensè mirantur, cæteras nationes despectui habent." Of course (which is a practice not uncommon to weak minds) he proceeded upon principles diametrically opposite to those of his predecessor, Sir Thomas Roe, who was a man of a solid and enterprizing genius; himself on the other hand fastidious and teasing; nesciuit, quod bene cessit, relinquere; insolent and national, narrow-minded, and prepossessed to the highest degree: and hence it was that Gustavus hated him for his prejudices in home-affairs, and despised him for his weaknesses in foreign ones. For he was a navigator, who sailed by no general wind in the ocean of politics, but affected to lie becalmed in the briskest gales; veering a little, or advancing a little, just as the breath blew from the court of Whitehall; and that (it is well known) never performed more than barely to disturb the surface of the water; sufficient to render objects indistinct and muddled, but not forcible enough to purify them, and make them conspicuous. Roe, by the dint of judgment, and un-assisted by the gift of divination, knew this politician to a tittle; and though some acrimony may be allowed him, as Vane supplanted him by mean court-artifices in the continuance of his embassy to Gustavus, yet in his letter † to the queen of Bohemia he speaks the words of good sense, and manly resentment; for he pronounces Vane to be a bold undertaker; by which animated expression, he means no more than a fervile and foolish one. "I know, says he, he cannot build upon my foundations.—This blow came from Vienna upon new pretences, that the prosperity of the king of Sweden would make our treaty easy, (with respect to the Palatinate) “ if a man were employed, that would advance “ peace, to which I was esteemed an enemy. I have honour enough in “ the sincerity of my negotiations, and that God hath blessed me, and “ made me the instrument ; though I boasted not, untill another would “ take my honour of bringing the brave king into Germany * ;—

 “ which I would rather have inscribed on my tomb, than titles dearly

To comprehend these two ministers conduct and characters more distinctly, it may not be amiss to observe, that Roe, who had served an apprenticeship in the arts of foreign negotiation, and, consistently with the interests of his own country, had contented the kings of Denmark and Sweden, (one the most experienced prince in Europe, and the other the ablest) was a sincere, solid, and sensible man, cool and composed in doubtful matters, but warm, fiery, enterprising, and undismayed in affairs of importance. Such an ambassador was not born under an horoscope congenial to the temperament of the Britannic king and ministers, who, as they wanted courage to tread the open road, weakly and timorously pursued such tracks as were clandestine and serpentine ; hating the heroical parts of war so much, that it was common for them, by way of derision, to call Gustavus the dragoon-king †.

Such was then the uniform language of the English court : for Sir Toby Matthew ‡, in a letter of March 25, from London to Sir

‡ Sir John Suckling in his Session of the Poets has characterized this infant politician to the life. He embraced the religion of the church of Rome about the thirtieth year of his age, and was called from his travels in 1621, to assist James I. in matters of politics ; was knighted for his zeal towards the Spanish march, and attended lord Strafford in Ireland as political director.

1631. Henry Vane, inserts therein the following passage ; “ Yesternight I “ waited at supper on my good lord of Carlisle, your true friend ; and “ there we had Sir Jacob Ashley at large. He seems a very worthy “ gentleman, and a great lover of my lord marquis [of Hamil“ ton] and you : he speaks highly well of the courage and other,
 “ both intellectual and experimental, abilities of the king of Swede .
 “ but I have heard no wise man say any such thing yet of that prince, &
 “ may totally exclude covetousness, and arrogance, and inordinate ambition
 “ from him.”*

Vane therefore was a person formed expressly by nature to suit the purposes of an administration, which relied wholly upon mean and temporary expedients. Roe was for giving Gustavus considerable sums of money, well knowing he would earn them nobly : Vane professed to withhold all pecuniary assistances, and proposed the transportation of British troops, which the king of Sweden never expected to arrive. Roe, by Oxenstiern's own acknowledgment, brought Gustavus into the empire : Vane, by the uniform tendency of his actions, repined at his glory, and wished him re-conveyed to his regions of the north. Roe was esteemed by the king, and beloved by Oxenstiern ; the former of which detested Vane, and the latter shunned him.

This phenomenon of a minister, equipped, as himself owns, with instructions of bearing rather than proposing †, landed at Hamburg in the month of October 1631 ; and there received the news of the famous victory at Leipzig. As he was comptroller of the king's household, and a member of the privy-council, it was thought

* With respect to covetousness, the king solemnly declared before all his officers (and they were judges of the truth of his assertion) that he had not secreted to himself a single pound from the commencement of the war till the month of August 1632, but, on the contrary, had expended de proprio 360000 l. sterling, a sum no ways inconsiderable in those days.—As to arrogance (except that be confounded with a right sense of indignities from crowned heads, &c.) we have proved him in every part of his life to be more condescending and affable than any of his generals.—And, lastly, as to ambition, posterity must be left in total incertitude, since he never lived to realize what might be the ultimate object of all his views.

proper to invest him with the character of ambassador extraordinary ; 1631. but by his own accounts, he had no title to the qualification of plenipotentiary. The occasion of sending him took its birth from the wonderful prosperity of Gustavus, and from some letters of his to the king and marquis of Hamilton, relative to that nobleman's expedition.

Vane employed twenty five days in travelling from Hamburg to Wurtzburg ; nor could he well perform the journey in less time, for the roads were difficult and dangerous, and flying parties of meroders * abounded so in every quarter, that it was necessary for him to provide a large retinue of horsemen, well mounted and completely armed ; nor could he dispatch an express to Gustavus or his generals, without manifest hazard to the undertaker's life or liberty. Which makes him complain in a subsequent letter the year ensuing, " that he could " not travel with a smaller retinue than fifty horsemen, nor expend less " on the road than twenty pounds each day."

On the seventh of November 1631, he had the honour to be admitted to his first private audience, in which the king told him, " That if " his master wished to effectuate the recovery of the Palatinate sincerely, " and with good faith, he must afford him such assistances, as justly " merited the appellation of royal ones, and not only supply him with " four or five tuns of gold †, (sums far from being very important to " a king of England so nearly concerned, if thoroughly in earnest,) " but convey to him early in the ensuing spring a body of national " troops amounting at least to 12000 men : and then Gustavus " added, that he would engage never to sheathe his sword, till the

* Having spelt this word differently from the writers of my own country, it may be considered as a common piece of respect to assign some reason. The truth is, these partizans took their name from a count de Merodé, a brutal and licentious officer in these wars, who was killed in a drunken quarrel by John de Wert. From this man's practice a plunderer and ravisher was surnamed Merodista by the Spanish and Italian soldiers, who served then under the emperor : from whence came the French word, marauder, which the maréchal de Luxemburg always spelt merodeur.

“ of its lawful possessor.”

Having thus explained himself with reference to the restitution of Frederic to his patrimonial inheritances, “ he made it his request, “ that the said unfortunate prince should repair immediately to the “ Swedish army, and march with it into his own dominions ; in“ asmuch as, according to the best informations then to be obtained, “ his subjects still preserved an extraordinary zeal and affection for “ him.”

“ instructions were rather to hear what the king had to offer, than to “ propose any thing himself : that he would not fail to advertise his “ court, and procure an answer with all possible expedition.”

Yet little as this man loved Gustavus, and prepossessed as he was in his disfavour, nevertheless, in his letters to England at or near this period, he finds himself obliged to do some justice to that prince’s character in the capacity of a soldier ; for having observed, that the Swedish army consisted of 12000 foot, and 8000 horse, he remarked afterwards, “ That better men, and better clothed, he never saw : and that there “ was not a sick man, nor boy amongst them. Their king let them “ live at discretion * : they spared neither friend nor foe ; only
“ he did not suffer them to touch the churches, nor molest the catho“ lics in the exercise of their religion. That they were so obedient to “ discipline, that the beat of a drum called them off at any time from “ plunder ;” which in truth carries no resemblance to the conduct of troops, who lived at discretion, and allowed themselves, or were allowed

* All history contradicts this report ; for the Swedish army in point of lenity made a contrast against the Imperial troops, with respect to ravages. The military laws of Gustavus are levelled with full force at rapine, extortions and plunder. He removed a favourite general some few days before this period for dealing a little too freely with contributions ; and hanged two foot-soldiers some few days afterwards for entering an house in Francfort-streets, though they took nothing. Nay, our whole story, more or less, makes proof against Vane’s assertion, which, to speak honestly, is a sophisticated truth with an alloy of falsehood in it.

by their master, to exercise all sorts of outrage and violence without restriction. Yet there remains still an almost incontestable proof, that the king's soldiers rarely or never practised extortions and cruelties, since we rarely find, that even a single straggler was massacred by enraged peasants; or that a town, or province, after their first reduction, ever revolted from him. But Sir Henry, on some other occasion, delivers himself in a manner less liable to exception than many of the passages above cited; "That with regard to Gustavus's actions and enterprises, all seasons were alike to him, as well as the most difficult achievements seemed to him easy, if he once took them in hand; and as the courage of the soldiers under so daring a leader is great, so is the fear of his enemies, who every day came to serve him: and though other armies are diminished by marching, his increased; so that he was able to supply the towns he took in with garrisons, and obliged them to maintain the same *."

This remark is not the less valuable, though at that time it was common in the mouths of all the officers, that served under Gustavus. Monro makes the same observation, and says, that the king, after marches, assaults, and sieges of forty days duration, found himself at the head of more soldiers when he came to Francfort, than he brought with him from Erfurt, though he crossed the vast Düringer Walt, without losing, as far as appears, a single soldier by desertion.

But to return to the negotiation; Vane contented himself to conclude his dispatches with observing, "That he thought nothing was to be expected from Gustavus, but what was stipulated: and by no means advised the putting of tons of gold into his hands, but rather the sending over an English army to act in conjunction with the Swedish." He suggested afterwards, "that if Charles was resolved to put himself in action, the readiest and cheapest way would be, to send the king of Bohemia up into Germany (into Upper Germany) speedily, to make levies; for that he was expected by his subjects with much zeal and devotion, and divers officers came to the am-
